What, then, will we do with a growing, massive federal surplus? The options are not attractive. One choice would be to buy publicly traded stocks. But even this has limited possibilities. Right now, the New York Stock Exchange has a market value of less than $3 trillion. And so we really want cabinet officers deciding which Fortune 1000 companies the federal government will take over by buying controlling interests? It may, in fact, be possible for the government to own all of them. There are many opportunities for manipulation. It's possible to imagine Congress and the administration being lobbied by shareholders in certain concerns to buy their shares rather than those of other companies. Bonds do not offer a way out either. While purchasing bonds avoids direct-ownership problems, there will not be enough bonds to go around in 2010 either.

The reason this dangerous accumulation was created is simple: politics. In 1982, the Social Security Commission, whose members were chosen by congressional leaders and the president, decided that any solution it recommended would leave no chance that Congress would ever face another OASDI funding shortage in this century. That meant contingency planning, assuming the worst was going to happen. The commission concluded that OASDI needed an increase in cash flow during the 1980s equal to $175 billion to $200 billion, an average of $25 billion a year. This was nearly three times the needed increase estimated by the SSA in 1982.

Another way to visualize this is to consider what the negative each flow would have been, assuming a continuation of prior experience. During 1982, which was a poor year for OADSI due to the recession, the funds lost $11 billion. If the recession had continued throughout the 1980s, the funds would have lost about $11 billion a year for seven years, a total of $77 billion. Assuming that the recession was going to last longer than the Great Depression of the 1930s is certainly cautious planning. The commission can be excused for not anticipating the robust recovery already under way. But was it necessary to increase the estimate for needed cash almost threefold even if one extrapolates bad times into the future?

The Social Security Administration didn't think so. In its annual report to Congress in 1982, it forecast that checkbook balances in OASDI would drop, under its likely but pessimistic scenario, from a positive $19 billion to a negative $54 billion in 1989. This $73 billion drop is a serious shortage, but it was only a fraction of the $175 billion to $200 billion that the commission chose as its baseline.

Congress' own budget office didn't believe $175 billion to $200 billion was needed either. In November 1982, the Congressional Budget Office projected OASDI balances through 1989. Its forecast showed that the combined checkbook balances would fall even less—to a negative $29 billion in 1989, unless Congress acted. The effect of political over-caution was to generate a power curve toward a $20 trillion dilemma.

We must see that the huge fund buildup engineered by the Social Security Commission never takes place. If $20 trillion never accumulates, we won't have to worry about breaking commitments by future raids on OASDI. And we won't have to invest it. To do so, however, a contract must be reached with today's workers. In exchange for permanently reducing their OASDI taxes, workers under 50 years of age must agree to lower their claims on OASDI benefits during the 21st century.

How could this be accomplished? One sound suggestion is to expand the use of IRAs or comparable savings vehicles to individuals under certain conditions. The chief condition is that favorable tax treatment of deposits into such accounts be linked to reduced OASDI benefits received at retirement. One approach would be to reduce benefits by 1% for a specified level of deposits. Chances are, millions would leap at the opportunity. Since skepticism remains deep, especially among the young, over whether benefits ever will be collected, it should be an appealing offer to give up 1% of nothing and get a tax break now and for years to come.

A final note: If the economy performs better than expected—and the odds of that happening equal the odds assumed by the commission that it will perform below expectations—the surplus projected by the SSA for 75 years from now is $73 trillion. And the administration, taking account of the current recovery, has released figures showing an even more favorable trend. Meanwhile, the bipartisan group composed of congressional and administration representatives that is working on the fiscal 1985 budget, which begins next Oct. 1, was quick to agree on just one thing: Don't tamper with the Social Security compromise.

Long-Range Projections of Social Security Trust Fund Operations in Dollars

(By Harry C. Ballantyne, A.S.A. Chief Actuary)

Some interest has been expressed in the dollar values of the estimated long-range projections of the operations of the combined Old-Age and Survivors Insurance (OASI) and Disability Insurance (DI) Trust Funds as well as the operations of the combined OASI, DI, and Hospital Insurance (HI) Trust Funds. Long-range projections typically are not shown as dollar amounts because of the noncomparability of such monetary units over time when inflation is taken into account. Instead, relative measures which are comparable over time have been developed. Two examples of such measures are cost rates and income rates, which express the cost and income of the program as percentages of taxable payroll. Another is the trust fund ratio, which expresses the assets of the Trust Funds as a proportion of the outgo during a specific period of time, usually the next year. These measures are discussed fully in the "1983 Annual Report, Federal Old-Age and Survivors Insurance and Disability Insurance Trust Funds" [1] (1983 OASDI Trustees Report). They are the ones that have been used by Social Security program planners and legislators to evaluate the long-range status of the program and the long-range effect of proposed changes to the program. Nonetheless, in view of the interest that continues to be expressed in long-range dollar values, this note presents long-range OASDI projections in current dollars together with several indices which can be used ot convert current dollars into constant dollars. In addition, the Appendix to this note presents financial projections of a more limited nature for the HI program and for the combined OASDI and HI programs.

Table 1 shows projections of the operations of the combined OASI and DI Trust Funds—that is, assets at the beginning of the year, tax income, total income, outgo, and assets at the end of the year. The footnotes in the table define these items. The projections are based on four sets of economic and demographic assumptions identified as Alternatives I, II-A, II-B, and III, which are described in detail in the 1983 OASDI Trustees Report. The projections of all these financial items are shown in current dollars.

A major consideration in converting current dollars to constant dollars is the selection of the index of conversion. Price indices adjust for the effects of price inflation. One price index presented in this note is the Consumer Price Index for Urban Wage Earners and Clerical Workers (CPI-W), which is published by the Bureau of Labor Statistics, Department of Labor. The CPI-W was chosen mainly because it is used to determine automatic increases in OASDI benefits. Another price index presented is the Implicit Price Deflator for the Gross National Product, hereafter referred to as the GNP deflator. Also shown are the GNP values themselves.

Wage indices adjust for the combined effects of price inflation and real-wage growth. The particular wage index presented in this note is the average annual amount of total wages. This wage series is used to adjust many of the Social Security program amounts that are subject to automatic adjustment (such as the contribution and benefit base).

Payroll indices adjust for the effects of variations in the number of workers as well as for the effect of price inflation and real-wage growth. This note presents the OASDI taxable payroll, which consists of all earnings subject to OASDI tax rates (including deemed wages based on military service), adjusted to reflect the lower tax rates (in comparison with the combined employee-employer rate) which apply to self-employment income through 1983, tips, and multiple-employer "excess wages."

The application of an interest rate is another way of converting dollar values through time. The selection of an interest rate can be based on many types of investments, such as those by individuals, groups, or the Social Security trust funds. The particular series of interest-rate indices presented in this note is based on the interest rates for special public-debt obligations issuable to the Social Security trust funds, which form the basis of the interest calculations done for the 1983 OASDI Trustees Report.

The CPI-W, after several years of varying increases, is assumed to increase annually by rates of 2, 3, 4, and 5 percent under alternatives I, II-A, II-B, and III, respectively. Similarly, the average annual wage is assumed to increase by 4.5, 5, 5.5, and 6 percent. After the first few years, no specific assumption is made about GNP growth; rather its projection is based on the complex interaction of many economic and demographic variables. Similarly, the projection of payroll growth is based on the interaction of many economic and demographic variables. Appendix A of the 1983 OASDI Trustees Report discusses the payroll projections more fully. The ultimate interest rate assumed is 5.06, 5.575, 6.08, and 6.575 percent under Alternatives, I, II-A, II-B, and III, respectively. These assumptions are the result of the compound effect of the ultimate annual increases assumed for the CPI-W (2, 3, 4, and 5 percent) with the respective ultimate real-interest rate assumptions (3, 2.5, 2, and 1.5 percent).

Table 2 shows these economic variables or functions thereof. The form of these tables is similar to that of the tables on Trust Fund operations in order to facilitate constant-dollar calculations that may be of interest to economic and financial analysts. It is left to the individual analyst to decide which variable to use to accomplish his or her particular purpose.

[2] Tax income consists of net OASDI payroll taxes and, after 1983, taxes on benefits; for 1983 it includes the amount transferred from the general fund of the Treasury to the OASI and DI Trust Funds on May 20, 1983, for costs of noncontributory wage credits for military service performed before 1957.

[3] Total income consists of tax income, interest income, and payments from the general fund of the Treasury for costs of benefits paid to certain noninsured persons who attained age 72 before 1968 and have less than three quarters of coverage.

[4] Outgo consists of benefits payments, administrative expenses, net transfers under the financial interchange between the OASI and DI Trust Funds and the Railroad Retirement Account, payments for vocational rehabilitation services for disabled beneficiaries, and payments to the noninsured persons described above.

[1] The CPI is a modification of the Consumer Price Index for Urban Wage Earners and Clerical Workers (CPI-W) as defined by the Bureau of Labor Statistics (BLS), Department of Labor. The CPI-W is the index on which OASDI automatic benefit increases are based. For a given year, the modification divides the average of the 12 monthly CPI-W values by the analogous 1983 value and multiplies the result by 100, thereby initializing the CPI-W at 100 in 1983.

[2] The GNP deflator is a modification of the implicit Price Deflator for Gross National Product as defined by BLS; the modification initializes the implicit Price Deflator for GNP at 100 in 1983.

[3] Average wage is the average annual amount of total wages; it is the index used in the calculations of initial benefits and the contribution and benefit base.

[4] Taxable payroll consists of total earnings subject to taxes credited to the OASI and DI Trust Funds, including deemed wages based on military service; these earnings are adjusted to reflect the lower effective tax rates (compared to the combined employee-employer rate) which apply to tips, multiple-employer "excess wages," and self-employment income through 1983.

[5] The compound interest-rate factor is based on the interest rates for special public-debt obligations issuable to the OASI and DI Trust Funds. Each can be used to convert dollar values between July 1, 1983, and July 1 of the year shown.

APPENDIX

This appendix presents OASDI and HI tax income and outgo as projected under Alternative II-B. The projections shown are more limited than the OASDI projections shown in the main part of this note because more detailed 75-year HI projections are not available. The reason for this unavailability of long-range HI projections is that the standard HI projection period is 25 years. In addition, negative assets are not projected for the HI program. Therefore, for example, because the HI Trust Fund is projected to be exhausted in 1990 under Alternative II-B, projected combined assets for OASDI and HI thereafter are unavilable. Consequently, because projections of assets are available for only such limited number of years, they have been omitted from this presentation. Similarly, because estimates of negative income are unavailable, projections of net interest income have been omitted.

The following table shows the tax income and outgo projected under Alternative II-B for the OASDI, HI, and the combined OASDI and HI programs. The footnotes in the table define these items. The form of this table is similar to that of table 7 in the main part of this note in order to facilitate constant-dollar calculations that may be of interest to economic and financial analysts.

[1] OASDI tax income consists of net OASDI payroll taxes and, after 1983, taxes on benefits; for 1983 it includes the amount transferred from the general fund of the Treasury to the OASI and DI Trust Funds on May 20, 1983, for costs of noncontributory wage credits for military service performed before 1957. The OASDI income is on a cash basis.

[2] OASDI outgo consists of benefit payments, administrative expenses, net transfers under the financial interchange between the OASI and DI Trust Funds and the Railroad Retirement Account, payments for vocational rehabilitation services for disabled beneficiaries, and payments to certain noninsured persons who attained age 72 before 1968 and have less than three quarters of coverage. The OASDI outgo is on a cash basis.

[3] HI tax income consists of HI payroll taxes (including taxes from railroad employment) and reimbursements from the general fund of the Treasury for costs of noncontributory wage credits for military service. The HI income is on an incurred basis.

[4] HI outgo consists of HI outlays for insured beneficiaries and administrative expenses. The HI outgo is on an incurred basis.●

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

OUR CHOICE: NATIONAL POWER OR PARALYSIS

HON. FLOYD SPENCE

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 5, 1984

● Mr. SPENCE. Mr. Speaker, last week, on Wednesday, March 28, the Chief of Naval Operations, Adm. James D. Watkins, delivered a memorable address to the Baltimore Council on Foreign Affairs. In remarks as timely as any I have read in a long time, Admiral Watkins examines the position in which our Nation presently finds itself when called upon to respond to an international crisis and concludes that we have serious problems in presenting to the rest of the world a clear or convincing image of our goals and commitments.

Admiral Watkins has rendered a great public service in highlighting some of the difficulties we face in projecting military power to influence the course of international events. His observations are mandatory reading for all serious students of foreign and military affairs. They deserve the most careful consideration of our colleagues and I am pleased to include at this point in the RECORD the full text of his remarks to the Baltimore Council on Foreign Affairs:

OUR CHOICE: NATIONAL POWER OR PARALYSIS

Let me take you back twenty-five years to 1958, when President Dwight D. Eisenhower told a tense Nation he was sending 5,000 Marines into Lebanon. Their mission—to preserve peace in the Middle East. His steps were tough, courageous and successful. Peace was preserved without firing a single shot.

Just four years later, on the evening of October twenty-second, 1962, President John F. Kennedy told us that the Soviets were preparing to introduce offensive, nuclear-tipped missiles into our hemisphere.

That was the beginning of a showdown between this Nation and the Soviet Union—the Cuban missile crisis. Again, an American President took quick steps to turn a crisis around, including the provocative step of implementing a strict naval quarantine on all offensive military equipment under shipment to Cuba.

These actions were summarized by President Kennedy, not with a threat, but with a promise—"any hostile move anywhere in the world against the safety and freedom of peoples to whom we are committed . . . will be met by whatever action is needed."

And again, aggressors understood the message. It was clear—we were standing ready to defend our national interests. They backed down and dismantled their missile sites in Cuba. Peace was preserved without firing a single shot.

In Lebanon in 1958, and off Cuba in 1962, we had the will power to stand tough. Proper use of diplomacy, fused with military power, stemmed each crisis. But would a belligerent Nation believe us today? Could we take quick action and keep peace? Some students of Government sincerely doubt it.

They say—at best, any similar action by a President today would cause full-scale debate, not only in Congress, but by armchair strategists as well, thereby dulling our reaction time. Our resolve would be doubted. Or at worst, we would fail to use military power effectively to carry out a mission of great urgency.

Why? Because something about us has changed they say; a metamorphosis occurred between the 1950s and the early 1980s. Over the past 30 years, we have all seen symptoms of this change.

First, there was Korea, then the pain of Vietnam. Later, we saw fellow citizens taken prisoner and humiliated in Iran, and a daily parade of media criticism which made it sound like we couldn't do anything right. There were plenty of symptoms of what appeared to be a terminal case of spirit loss.

Vietnam, more than any other single event, epitomized this change in America. The images of this conflict, from Kent State to Khe Sanh, flashed upon our TV screens each night and nauseated this country. We wondered what we were doing in that mess.

For us in the military, Vietnam was a confusing and ever-changing maze of rules of engagement and policy. The Vietnam conflict—which I don't even call a war because we lacked a national commitment to win—was like an exercise in how to fight by public opinion poll.

I can remember the time, when I was executive officer of the cruiser U.S.S. Long Beach, that we had to self-destruct one of our missiles aimed and fired at a North Vietnamese MIG aircraft, retiring back to Hanoi after raiding our forces in the South, because predicted missile intercept was slightly north of a certain Vietnamese parallel—an arbitrary political restriction. During the Vietnam conflict, political considerations here at home often dictated military operations to a debilitating extent.

So a creeping national malaise began to infect this Nation's spirit, drive and determination. Many individuals have questioned our self-worth, doubted our dignity, and with that, every American value we had always nourished and cherished. Some have rejected principles which worked for us in the past, which helped to make us great.

Rejected too was an important principle, one which had worked for us from our very beginnings. This was the principle which allowed a President to use military force judiciously in support of national policy and security.

This basic principle of our Constitution was clouded by passage of the War Powers Resolution of 1973. This resolution was caused by a long queue of events—starting with a hotly-contested, much-debated, "police action" in Korea—and culminating in the Vietnam experience.

But today, America has changed. We are on the move again. Our military strength, once decimated, is building anew. Our economy is improving, and people are going back to work. But most importantly, Americans are again feeling good about themselves and this great Nation.

Still, some symptoms of that era of defeat remain, causing us to falter a bit as we step forward. I see some symptoms remaining in areas close to my daily experience, as uniformed head of our Navy, and member of the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

Case in point—recently in Lebanon, we executed a mission called "Presence." Presence is supposed to signal our interest in an area or a situation. But this signal was weakened by time limitations imposed under the War Powers Resolution. This influenced our military mission in Lebanon, and hampered our President from carrying out national objectives in a well-planned manner.

Now all we hear is the presto-pundits, coming out with their analysis of our military presence in Lebanon. You lost they say; you retreated they proclaim; all this with an "I told you so" tone of glee in their voice. But while the man in uniform is easy to identify at the scene of the action, it is unfair to pin blame on his lapel without looking at underlying causes.

So how can this Nation best use her military forces? By allowing the President to exercise his constitutional powers, and then holding him accountable for his actions; not by preempting his proper action by removing his powers.

We can do this by curing the few remaining symptoms of our past weaknesses. We must shirk off the Vietnam syndrome of humiliation and defeat, which hounds our capability to implement positive change. I believe a good way to start is for Congress to carefully review the War Powers Resolution of 1973.

Much has happened over the past ten years. Perhaps now it is time to factor in the lessons we learned. Reviewing the War Powers Resolution could help us develop better ways to meet the needs of a dynamic, effective foreign policy. Heresy? I do not believe so.

I am not a constitutional scholar, and must judge this resolution's effects through my experience as a military leader. For this reason, I believe that while the intent of this legislation is good, the result is not as clear.

This resolution was born out of controversy, fathered by an uneasy Congress over the veto of a politically-wounded President. It directs a President to consult whenever possible with Congress prior to introduction of U.S. forces into any hostilities or situations where imminent hostilities are clearly indicated; it requires a President to report to Congress within 48 hours after the introduction of U.S. Armed Forces into those situations; and to terminate the use of Armed Forces in hostilities, or situations of imminent hostilities, within 60 days. When bound by this resolution, the only alternatives then available are: Congress subsequently declares war, extends the 60-day time period or authorizes use of force as the President feels necessary . . . alternatives announced to the adversary for him to manipulate by counter-political strategies.

Proponents of this resolution say it is part of a valid congressional movement, designed to "create machinery for timely consultation and codetermination of national policy." This is a worthy goal, and I fully support the value of consultation between our executive and legislative branches.

Although drafted to limit what was seen as limitless powers of an imperial Presidency—an answer to "no more Koreas" and "no more Vietnams"—the resolution's ability to keep us out of future Vietnams is questionable. Some forget Vietnam, in its early stages, was a veritable cause célèbre.

The Gulf of Tonkin resolution, which committed us to Vietnam, passed in Congress by an overwhelming margin of 504 to 2. And it wasn't until the TET offensive, four years later—long after we were deeply committed—that bipartisan support of Vietnam began to erode on Capitol Hill.

The war powers resolution has had a far-ranging impact on our President's ability to exercise, and to implement, foreign policy in the world's trouble spots. His ability to act decisively and effectively is hobbled because the military arrow in his quiver of responses, the most effective symbol of resolve in executing a strong American foreign policy, has been blunted.

This is not to say military solutions are the best or only solutions available to this Nation. I have never proclaimed employment of military power as an option, except as a last resort. Military options are no panacea, and should never substitute for aggressive diplomatic efforts or other measures to implement national policy and strategy.

But many of these "other" measures are severely curtailed by legislation limiting foreign sales, educational exchanges, and effectively vetoing military and economic assistance through the budget process. Because of this, successive administrations have been forced to turn reluctantly to military force, or the threat of military force. This is sometimes the easiest, and only, option left to them.

This Nation uses military force to prevent escalation of conflict, to force a diplomatic settlement. In other words, to keep peace with the least possible loss of life. But to accomplish this objective, military force must be sufficient, sustainable and credible. It is up to our President, as Commander in Chief, to use military power carefully in this way.

But military force, which is easy to call upon—because we are ready to go on a moment's notice—is difficult to use, particularly when there is no commitment to win. Military missions quickly grab headlines, national will begins to falter, self-doubt and self-criticism set in.

What was thought to be the easiest solution to our problems suddenly becomes very difficult. Unfortunately, because of restrictions, like the war powers resolution, we sometimes end up preventing our President from effectively using the tool of military force.

Henry Kissinger, in his definitive memoir—Years of Upheaval—relates a story about a tense moment during the October 1973 war when he, as Secretary of State, met with Soviet Ambassador Dobrynin. In a stiff warning, Secretary Kissinger told Dobrynin, "any Soviet military intervention (in the Middle East)—regardless of pretext—would be met by American force." But parenthetically, Dr. Kissinger adds in his book—and I quote—"It would have been a more convincing threat had I made it on any other day. For that very day the Congress passed the so-called War Powers Act, whose purpose was to reduce Presidential discretion in committing American military forces."

Domestically, this resolution is cited often by those who disagree with the President for the sake of political posturing. They challenge his decisions in the media, without either knowing the stakes at hand or producing viable alternatives. We see debate for political reasons, when we should see debate for policy formulation. The result? Unfocused micromanagement of foreign commitments, well beyond a time when policy should be fully implemented. Decisionmaking, and our security, is not enhanced in the process. Worse, those who interfere in this manner are seldom held accountable when failures occur.

Overseas, the international press focuses on what appears to be disunity and a lack of national will. Our friends and allies do not understand this process, and believe our commitments have a hollow ring. Our foes take hope and increase their resolve, waiting out partisan debate, hoping to win politically what they cannot win militarily.

This is dangerous, for when our intentions and capabilities are questioned, so is our ability to prevail if directly challenged. And when this is lost, deterrence—the foundation of our national strategy and what has helped avoid global conflict for about forty years—is placed in jeopardy.

I am not speaking out against consultation between executive and legislative branches. Indeed, an effective national policy must be bipartisan in nature, the craft of able-thinking men and women throughout Government. I am not speaking out against Congress' established constitutional role in foreign policy and military operations. I support Congress' ability, through the normal legislative process, to qualify our participation in hostilities. However, special legislation was not needed to require consultation or to enforce Congress' already-established powers.

What is needed is not a constitutional power-sharing debate, not political maneuverings required to avoid such debate, but a search for a solution to the tough global problems we must face.

This Nation must be ready, and must be seen as being ready, to use military power when forced to do so by our adversaries. We must shown American power—not American paralysis.

I am not here to apologize for any past actions, military or otherwise. I am proud of this Nation. I am proud of our Navy's capability to carry out missions assigned to us by our President. Our actions in Grenada are an example of how well we can do when we act quickly with identifiable goals. There, the military was given a precise mission.

Your military forces today are good. Let there be no doubt. I am proud of them and their growing capabilities. If this Nation had not reacted, at what I consider to be a critical turning point in early 1981, we would be in a considerably weakened state today.

So in answer to whether or not we could take prompt action to stem crisis, as we have in the past—I know the military capability exists, and when directly challenged, this Nation will come to its feet. But we need to guarantee more. We need to prevent crisis from turning to war. This is no easy task, but it can be accomplished by early use of all tools—diplomatic, economic and military—which are part of this Nation's coherent national strategy of defense.

The President has brought together all underpinnings of a national strategy. Now it is up to this Nation to let the President use the tools at his disposal. All our resurgent military strength or diplomatic undertakings will be of no use, if our national leaders do not have the freedom to act in accordance with constitutional powers. As a nation, we have not done everything we can to ensure our leaders have the freedom to act with strength. So, we must clear the decks of Vietnam-era debris— we must allow our leaders to lead.

To paraphrase William Pitt's advice to Great Britain in an hour of peril, America can save herself by her own exertions and help save the rest of the world by her example. Now, let's set the example—it's the right thing to do. Our historic mission of preserving peace and freedom requires no less.

Thank you and God bless.●

WILLIAM "GUMMY" KNIGHT, MAYOR AND "MR. MUNHALL"

HON. JOSEPH M. GAYDOS

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 5, 1984

● Mr. GAYDOS. Mr. Speaker, as all of us in the House are painfully aware, politics is not the most popular of professions today. It is particularly true for those politicians who serve communities or areas which have been ravaged by the economic recession and plagued by sustained high unemployment.

And, yet, in spite of such adversity, I know a politician so popular among his constituents that on Sunday, May 6, some 700 of them will turn out for a testimonial in his honor.

The man is William S. "Gummy" Knight, a dean among Pennsylvania politicians, having spent the past 42 years in public office, and still counting. Currently serving his 28th year as mayor of his community, he has earned the title of "Mr. Munhall" and wears it exceedingly well.

His reputation as a public servant is such that he has been described as: Honest, dependable, tolerant, understanding, generous, a good citizen, friend, and father—a legend in his own time.

Those are lofty adjectives but right on target. "Gummy" Knight is, indeed, all of those and more. He also is dedicated, industrious, warm, unassuming, and extremely well liked in Munhall and western Pennsylvania.

He began his career in public office as a member of the Munhall Borough Council, serving several terms before settling into the mayor's office. In 1968, he was elected president of the Pennsylvania Mayors Association, and in 1971, assumed the same post with the Allegheny County Boroughs Association.

In 1978, his close friend and political ally, State Representative Don Abraham, was killed in a tragic automobile accident; Mayor Knight stepped in to fill the gap. He served the remaining part of Mr. Abraham's term and went on to win reelection. He served both as mayor and State representative over a 3-year period and in spite of the awesome responsibilities of the two offices, he served well.

He took with him to Harrisburg the political philosophy that proved so successful for him as mayor of Munhall: Government should never outspend the capacity of the people to pay.

Despite the demands of public office on his personal life, Mayor Knight has maintained a deep interest in programs for the young people of his community. He has sponsored scores of softball and baseball teams and was directly involved in organizing Little, Pony, and Prep League programs.

Mr. Speaker, I ask my colleagues in the Congress of the United States to join me in extending our official congratulations to Mayor William S. "Gummy" Knight—"Mr. Munhall"—and his lovely wife, Dorothy. They have earned the admiration, respect, and the love of an entire community.●

BUDGET STUDY FINDS CUTS COST THE POOR AS THE RICH GAINED

HON. ROBERT GARCIA

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 5, 1984

● Mr. GARCIA. Mr. Speaker, I would like to call the attention of my colleagues to yesterday's New York Times and Washington Post articles, highlighting the Congressional Budget Office's report on the cumulative effect of budget and tax changes adopted since January 1981. The numbers compiled by the CBO are clear proof that the spending changes enacted by the Reagan administration have resulted in a net loss for our Nation's poorest, and a net gain for the rich.

Who benefits from Reaganomics? The Federal Government lost $93.6 billion to tax cuts this year while saving only $23.1 billion from cuts in cash and noncash benefit programs. This net loss of $70.5 billion was a major contributor to the Federal deficit, expected to exceed $180 billion this year. While people in higher income brackets absorbed the majority of the tax reductions, the poor and elderly saw their social programs cut drastically.

Tax and spending reductions must not only be equal, but also fair to all Americans. Yet the Congressional Budget Office observed that "total tax changes exceed the total benefit reductions" for all but the poorest households. I simply cannot see the justification for the policies of the Reagan administration that continue to drain assistance from our Nation's neediest.

The articles follow:

BUDGET STUDY FINDS CUTS COST THE POOR AS THE RICH GAINED

(By Robert Pear)

WASHINGTON, April 3.—The Congressional Budget Office, analyzing the cumulative effect of budget and tax changes adopted since January 1981, said today that low-income families had lost the most money and high-income families had gained the most.

While the findings were not unexpected, the report was the first detailed study showing the effects of the recent tax and budget cuts on households at different income levels.

For example, it said, households with annual incomes of less than $10,000 have lost, on the average, $390 a year. Households with incomes of $40,000 to $80,000 have gained an average of $2,900 a year, it said, and families with more than $80,000 of income have gained on the average, $8,270 a year.

The study, done at the request of Senator Lawton Chiles of Florida, the ranking Democrat on the Senate Budget Committee, estimated the combined effects of all the changes in tax and spending policy since President Reagan took office.

"The combined impact of the tax and benefit changes since 1981 is a net loss in income for those in the lowest category, and an increase for the other four groups," the report said, referring to five different income brackets. "Those in the lowest income category lose more in cash benefits than they gain from the tax changes in every year."

Reagan Administration officials said the results were to be expected because Congress in 1981, at Mr. Reagan's request, cut tax rates across the board, and such cuts are inherently worth more to people in high-income brackets, who typically pay more in taxes than low-income households.

The data in the new report are likely to be used in the election-year debate over the equity and fairness of Mr. Reagan's policies. The tax cuts, in particular, were designed by the Administration to increase incentives for people to work save and invest.

The Congressional Budget Office is a nonpartisan agency respected on Capitol Hill for its independence and technical expertise. But David A. Stockman, director of the Office of Management and Budget, an executive branch agency, has attacked the methods used in some of its earlier studies assessing the "distributive effects" of Administration policies.

"Soak-the-rich apologists use these meaningless static calculations to concoct examples purporting to show that the tax policy changes enacted over the last two years have had the effect, when combined with spending reductions in entitlement programs, of physical movement of large amounts of income from low-income Americans to high-income Americans," Mr. Stockman told Congress last year. These "alleged regressive income transfers" are "an absolute red herring," he said, and people should "not believe a word of it."

Edwin L. Dale Jr., a spokesman for the Office of Management and Budget, said today that he had not seen the latest report. It was unfair for Democrats to criticize the President, he said, because many of the biggest tax and budget changes were adopted with bipartisan support. The Office of Management and Budget has not done its own studies to determine how the changes affected people at different income levels, he said.

A MAJOR FACTOR IN DEFICIT

In its new study, the Congressional Budget Office tried to take account of prior criticism by the Administration. The study shows that the Federal government lost far more money from tax cuts ($93.6 billion this year) than it saved from all the changes in cash and noncash benefit programs ($23.1 billion). The disparity was a major factor contributing to the Federal deficit, which is expected to exceed $180 billion this year.

According to the study, the average household gained $1,090 this year as a result of the tax cuts, but lost $170 in Federal cash benefits and $100 in noncash benefits, for a net gain of $820. Noncash benefits include food stamps, housing subsidies and Medicaid and Medicare, the health programs for the poor and elderly.

Families that pay little or nothing in taxes, however, get little or no benefit from a tax cut. Thus, the tax cuts were worth, on the average, only $20 a year to families with incomes less than $10,000. They were worth an average of $330 a year to households with income from $10,000 to $20,000; $1,200 a year for families in the $20,000-to-$40,000 bracket, and $3,080 a year for families in the $40,000-to-$80,000 bracket. The tax cuts were worth an average of $8,390 a year to families with incomes of more than $80,000, the study said.

Higher-income families, predictably, received smaller benefits from the Government's social welfare programs and were therefore less affected by the budget cutbacks of the last three years. The cutbacks, according to the report, took an average of $410 a year from families with incomes of less than $10,000. They took an average of $300 from families with incomes of $10,000 to $20,000. For households with higher incomes, the cutbacks took less. Thus, for example, they took an average of $130 a year from families with incomes of more than $80,000.

The Congressional Budget Office said "total tax changes exceed the total benefit reductions" for all but the poorest households. Further, it said, the 1981 tax law "provided the highest income group with most of their tax reduction up front," by reducing the top rate to 50 percent from 70 percent, "while the majority of households received their tax cut in stages over several years."

Mr. Stockman has insisted the tax cuts were not a "windfall for the wealthy."

Economists at the Congressional Budget Office stood by their calculations. The figures, they said, were based on tax collection data from the Treasury, not theoretical computations of tax liability.

[From the Washington Post, Apr. 5, 1984]

POOREST ARE LOSING, WEALTHY GAINING

The poorest Americans have lost more than they have gained from tax and spending changes enacted since President Reagan took office, the Congressional Budget Office reported yesterday.

A family that earned less than $10,000 in 1983 was $270 worse off because of Reagan's policies, the CBO said. By contrast, a household whose income was $80,000 or more was $7,070 better off, the study concluded.

In between those extremes, at the $10,000-to-$20,000 income level a couple or individual was about $70 better off, those between $20,000 and $40,000 gained $790, and those earning between $40,000 and $80,000 fared $2,180 better than if the President's program had not been enacted.

The under-$10,000 earners will lose another $390 this year and $440 in 1985, the report concluded, while top earners will gain $8,270 this year and $8,930 next.

The report considered effects of across-the-board tax reductions enacted in 1981, selected tax increases approved in 1982, cuts in the growth of numerous spending programs over the past three years, and 1983 changes in Social Security benefits. It does not include a change that, for the first time, will result in taxation of some Social Security benefits.

When households at all income levels are considered, taxes were reduced a total of $68 billion and cash benefits were cut $7.1 billion last year, CBO said. In addition, reductions of "in-kind benefits," including food stamps and housing aid, totaled $5.6 billion.

Those changes together increased spendable household incomes by $55.2 billion last year.●

DEMOCRACY ENLARGED; ALSO POLLUTED

HON. AL SWIFT

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 5, 1984

● Mr. SWIFT. Mr. Speaker, ever since the early television network projections of the results of the Presidential election in 1980, many of us who are concerned about the integrity of our elections have been pointing out the dangers such projections present to our electoral process, and urging the networks to exercise voluntary restraint.

In the primaries that have been conducted so far this year, there is some evidence that the networks have been exercising more restraint in making projections—but they have moved into the even more difficult area of characterizing elections. And those characterizations are simply a different way to continue to convey to the viewers all the information the networks have from their exit polls.

What the networks continue to seem not to understand is that people simply do not want to be told what they have done in an election until after they have done it. They want to know that their votes count, and not to hear that the election has been decided in the polls.

Once again, in New York, the networks could not resist announcing who their pollsters had determined was the winner while the polls were still open and thousands of people had not yet voted.

The New York Times today has an excellent editorial on this subject:

The editorial follows:

DEMOCRACY ENLARGED; ALSO POLLUTED: CHEATING THE VOTERS ON THE EVENING NEWS

Sometimes, to those of us in the print branch of the news business, television can be an exasperating cousin. We share many interests and problems with TV news and just two days ago advocated freeing its political coverage from Government regulation. But that very night, election night in New York—and hours before the polls closed—the networks were pronouncing magisterially that it was a big night for Walter Mondale. Don't they see this as an abuse of the vote? Don't they hear the properly angry reaction bubbling up around the country?

The issue is not accuracy. The Tuesday reports, based on exit polls, were correct. And the issue should not be exit polling, an invaluable tool for finding out why people vote the way they do. The issue is the abuse of exit polls.

Besides analyzing the vote, exit polls can be used to anticipate the results before the voting has ended. And if the findings are reported while people are still voting, that risks infecting the outcome. What are people apt to do when they hear that their candidate's way ahead—or behind? Not vote. And that can alter the outcome, if not for those candidates then for others on the ballot.

TV news knows all that, and responsible broadcasters assert that they will wait until the voting booths close before divulging their exit polls. But they are cheating on that resolve, as can be seen in excerpts from the 7 o'clock news Tuesday night.

The baldest report was on NBC: "In New York, where the polls are still open, Mondale appears to be winning by a decisive margin. Interviews with voters leaving the polling places indicate that Mondale is the first choice of most groups." Note the words winning and decisive. The language was more measured on CBS ("This may be a big night for Walter Mondale and Jesse Jackson") and ABC ("It appears to be going well for Walter Mondale"). Appears from what? On all three networks, the point was unmistakable: Sure, dear viewer, there are two hours of voting left, but never mind, things are all wrapped up.

Democracy depends on a free press because the public needs unfettered access to news. But democracy also depends on an untainted vote, and premature reporting of exit polls can taint the vote. Fearing that, Washington state passed a law last year to keep poll-takers away from voters, a law that this newspaper and others are challenging in Federal court. Florida and Hawaii have passed similar laws; Massachusetts is thinking about it.

Such regulation is deeply offensive because it inserts a governmental nose into reporting and because exit polls, which The Times conducts with CBS, contribute so much to public understanding of the electoral process. The polls deserve protection—and the best protection would be for broadcast journalists to report them responsibly, which, most of all, means after the voting has ended.

If broadcasters keep rushing to use exit polls to predict that so-and-so will win, they'll unleash an avalanche of outrage. That would risk wiping out the good, irreplaceable data about the vote, along with the bad, and for what? Does any TV news executive believe that would improve political reporting?●

ACCOUNTING FOR SALVADORANS

HON. JERRY M. PATTERSON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 5, 1984

● Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. Speaker, as chairman of the subcommittee on International Development Institutions and Finance, I accompanied a private group of citizens to El Salvador in February. I came home startled by the lack of accountability for U.S. economic assistance, and in spite of very clear human rights objectives, by the continued suffering of the Salvadoran people.

Chairman Mazzoli has agreed to hold hearings on the status of Salvadorans displaced by war and continuing civil strife. I am encouraged by his willingness to openly discuss the question of extended voluntary departure for Salvadorans and other displaced persons from the Central American region with Reagan administration officials. Certainly, some verifiable method must be found to assure the safety of nationals sent back to their homeland, before they are forceably returned.

I would like to submit the following Los Angeles Times editorial for review by our House colleagues. It depicts the difficult situation which the Subcommittee on Immigration, Refugees and International Law will examine next week.

The article follows:

[From the Los Angeles Times, Jan. 30, 1984]

A DEADLY PATTERN

The statistics are inconclusive, but nonetheless frightening. Preliminary results of a special survey indicate that one out of every 50 persons deported from the United States to El Salvador in the last two years may have been killed after returning home.

The fate of Salvadoran refugees living illegally in the United States has been a sensitive issue for the U.S. government since the start of El Salvador's civil war four years ago. Immigration officials insist that most of the Salvadorans in this country are "economic refugees" who, like other illegal immigrants, come here because jobs are unavailable in their homeland. Refugee advocates contend that the Salvadorans have fled because their lives are in genuine danger, which should entitle them to political asylum under U.S. immigration laws.

The figures released last week were compiled by the Center for Immigrants' Rights and the American Civil Liberties Union as part of a lawsuit intended to force the U.S. Immigration and Naturalization Service to stop routinely deporting Salvadoran illegals. Researchers obtained the immigration service's list of Salvadorans deported from the United States during 1982-83, and are comparing the names of those deportees with the names of victims of political violence compiled by various human-rights groups in El Salvador. Thus far, 2,500 names of deportees have been reviewed, and 50 match names on the death lists.

Refugee advocates say that these preliminary findings indicate that some Salvadoran deportees do face torture and death in their homeland. But the immigration service is still dubious. A spokesman for the agency cited studies done by U.S. Embassy officials in El Salvador, who have found that the government's much-feared security forces have "very little interest" in persons deported from the United States.

The granting of political asylum can be a long, legally complicated process. It also has diplomatic and political overtones that the Administration finds troubling, because granting asylum to Salvadoran refugees suggests that they may be in danger from the same government that is receiving U.S. military and financial support.

We have argued before that the simplest way around this diplomatic dilemma would be for the immigration service to grant Salvadoran refugees in this country a special legal status known as extended voluntary departure. An alien in that status has admitted to being in the United States illegally but is allowed to remain here temporarily until political turmoil in his homeland has ended. This status is currently granted routinely to refugees from Poland, and was granted to Nicaraguans and Ethiopians during recent political trouble in their countries.

Considering the public pressure that the Reagan Administration has recently put on the Salvadoran government to force it to control right-wing death squads, some of which have clear links to the security forces, and the Kissinger Commission's findings that human-rights abuses are a serious problem in El Salvador, the granting of extended-voluntary-departure status to Salvadoran refugees would not be such a dramatic step, either legally or diplomatically.

There are two bills pending in Congress, Senate Bill 2131 and House Resolution 4447, that would grant Salvadorans in this country a status similar to extended voluntary departure. If the Reagan Administration continues to oppose such status for Salvadoran refugees, the bills should be enacted. But Congress should not have to act on a problem that the immigration service could handle administratively. Its continued quibbling over the diplomatic and legal niceties of asylum for Salvadoran refugees is both foolish and heartless.●

MORE HUMAN RIGHTS ABUSES BY THE SALVADORAN TERRORISTS

HON. PHILIP M. CRANE

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 5, 1984

● Mr. PHILIP M. CRANE. Mr. Speaker, one of the most distressing tendencies among the mass media of this country is that of reporting only those incidents that support the viewpoint of those doing the reporting. The Government and leaders of El Salvador can readily attest to this fact. Media reports on the activities, ideology, and motives of the Communist insurgents have been consistently biased in their favor, while reports on the Government and its activities, on the other hand, have been filled with vituperation and bitter denunciation. To read the nonsense presented by the majority of the media, one would think that the battle going on in El Salvador is nothing more than a grassroots uprising involving a small number of peaceloving farmers armed with pitchforks and slingshots valiantly fighting against a huge force of deranged, well aimed disciples of Attila the Hun. Far too infrequently do we hear any news that ascribes blame to the Marxist terrorists for the war that has ravaged that nation for over 4 years now.

The fact of the matter is, the terrorists fighting in El Salvador are not simple peasants, nor are they "agrarian reformers" whose only goal is to right past wrongs. Their human rights record is infinitely worse than that of the Government forces, in spite of what the media would have us believe. The following article that appeared in a recent issue of the Christian Science Monitor details one example of how these terrorists violate the human rights of those they are supposedly "freeing." Forced recruitment can certainly not be called popular liberation. I hope my colleagues will take a few moments to read this enlightening report.

FORCED RECRUITMENT DRIVE BOLSTERS SALVADORAN GUERRILLA RANKS

(By Chris Hedges)

SAN ESTEBAN CATARINA, EL SALVADOR.—Insurgent guerrillas have begun a forced recruitment drive in the small northern towns in this department.

The forced recruitment, which has brought dozens of young men into the guerrilla ranks, may be the prelude to increased military assaults within the San Vicente department, some observers here speculate.

Three towns in San Vicente have been overrun by the Faribundo Marti National Liberation Front (FMLN) guerrillas in the past week and several towns have been the scene of press-ganging by the rebel forces.

The insurgents publicly targeted the San Vicente department last fall. Many observers here feel the Salvadorean guerrillas hope to deliver a major blow to the faltering United States-sponsored pacification program currently under way in the department.

"The guerrillas surrounded San Esteban Catarina at 4:30 in the morning on Thursday," says town clerk Angel Garcia Aragon sitting in the small town office. "They entered the town, pounded on the doors of the houses, and ordered everyone into the town square."

Once in the square, according to Garcia and other town residents, guerrilla leaders spoke to the crowd. The Salvadorean guerrillas, town residents contend, numbered several hundred and were well equipped.

"During the meeting," Garcia says, looking toward the charred remains of a stack of papers, "they threw a bomb in the room where they keep the town records and everything caught fire. They also stole the sacks of [US] AID food we had in the office."

Government officials in the capital contend that the guerrillas, in addition to carrying off office equipment, walked away with 1,400 blank state identification cards from the town hall.

"The guerrillas condemned the election as a farce and said that the elections would not resolve the conflict," says José Albino Duarte. "They told us they would win a military victory and were fighting for the interests of the poor."

"After the meeting," says Manuel Vicente Montano, whose son was abducted, "the guerrillas ordered the men to separate from the group and form a line. I started to walk toward the other men when they told me to go back because I was too old."

Town residents say the guerrillas took 49 young men. Two of the men were reserve Army members, two were former soldiers, and six were former members of the town's now defunct civil defense unit, according to residents.

"First the Army takes them away to serve in the military, and then the guerrillas take them away to serve with them," a man says. "I guess it completes the cycle."

"At first we watched our boys being lead away in silence," a mother says. "We began to cry and followed the column out of town.

"We pleaded with the guerrillas to let our sons, who were now crying with us, to remain. When we got to the cemetery, we were told we could go no further."

Two hours after the early morning abduction six of the youngest boys, all under 16, returned to the village.

Around the central square in San Esteban Catarina are small hand-made white flags. Each flag has the word "peace" artfully written on it.

"The 42 Treasury Police assigned to protect the town left on Dec. 10," Garcia says. "Since that time there has been no military presence here. The priest had the flags made and put up in the hopes that it could help us.

"On Friday, the Roman Catholic priest and mothers of the abducted boys went to the capital to file testimonies at the Roman Catholic human rights office.

"We are sad because we have lost many of the youth from our town," Hilda del Carmen Serrano says, "and we are scared because at any moment the guerrillas can come back and take more of us, or perhaps if they come into the town angry, they will shoot."

"I do not believe the guerrillas are fighting for us," Montano says, "because what they promise is absurd. A man cannot be poor as I am, and then rich in a year or two years.●

HOUSE LEADERSHIP PENALIZES CIVIL SERVICE ONCE AGAIN

HON. STAN PARRIS

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 5, 1984

● Mr. PARRIS. Mr. Speaker, I am extremely distresssed by the fact that the House leadership has once again targeted active and retired Federal workers for more reductions in their pay and benefits.

This week I requested the House Rules Committee to approve a rule to the budget which would allow an amendment to preserve the June 1984 cost-of-living adjustment for Federal retirees. My request was denied.

The House Rules Committee, however, did approve eight different budget proposals, all of which reduced the pay and benefits of active and retired Government workers. This is outrageous.

Mr. Speaker, I recognize the need for budget restraint and I strongly support many of the proposals which have been discussed, including a modest reduction in defense spending. The House has failed to recognize something that I have pointed out to this body on numerous occasions. Government workers and annuitants have already been required to make more than their fair share of sacrifices.

Due to the inequitable treatment of our civil servants, I have found it necessary to vote against budget proposals in 1982, 1983, and now again in 1984. The House has before it eight different budget proposals which unfairly penalize those individuals who have been required to make a great number of sacrifices in the past few years. In the past year alone, active employees have had their health insurance premiums increased substantially while their health benefits have been reduced. In addition, they received only a 3.5-percent COLA which was delayed for 3 months. The President's pay advisers have recommended at least a 20-percent increase in order to be comparable with their counterparts in the private sector. While total comparability may not be realistic, clearly, 3.5 percent is inadequate.

The budget proposals approved by the Rules Committee and presented to the House of Representatives provide limited COLA's for the civil service or none at all. Health benefits would be reduced further and retirement benefits would be subject to additional reductions.

As I have said before, active and retired Government workers have already made more than their fair share of sacrifices in an effort to restore some vitality to our economy. They should not again be the target of further reductions. The cumulative effect of this insensitive approach is devastating. We will not be able to attract the most qualified or the most skilled to serve in Government and we will continue to lose our best people to jobs in the private sector.

The American public expects and deserves competent civil servants to provide critical services. The individuals who work at the Federal Bureau of Investigation, at the National Institutes of Health, at the Social Security Administration, and other Federal facilities are all Government employees whose work affects our daily lives. If the Federal Government becomes any less attractive for employment, we will end up with a work force composed of individuals who cannot find employment elsewhere. Taxpayers will lose out in the long run by paying more money for less service.

The Federal Government has a moral and contractual obligation to its employees and annuitants. The Congress needs to recognize this obligation and recognize the fact that these people have sacrificed enough.●

PRIME-TIME TELEVISION MOVES TO NEW YORK

HON. ROBERT GARCIA

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 5, 1984

● Mr. GARCIA. Mr. Speaker, a recent New York Times article pointed out CBS' commitment to expand prime-time television series production in New York. New York has become one of the principal sources for new television production, tapping new writers, new producers, and new creative ideas. With the recent expansion of production facilities, New York is no longer a costly alternative. In fact, CBS officials believe that the new location brings a new appealing look, accompanied by a fresh and imaginative style of writing.

The article follows:

[From the New York Times, Mar. 19, 1984]

CBS Is Promoting New York Shows—New Series To Begin; Three Pilots Set

(By Sally Bedell Smith)

With tonight's premiere of "Kate & Allie," a spunky new prime-time comedy series produced in New York about two divorced mothers living together with their children in Greenwich Village, CBS is as eager to prove a point as it is to have a hit.

"We want to send a signal that we have a real commitment to working here, that a homegrown show can be done here, and that it need not be done with a tremendous increase in cost," said Josh Kane, vice president of program development in New York for CBS.

"Kate & Allie," which will be shown at 9 P.M., is CBS's first New York-based series in three years. It comes amid a new burst of activity by the network to promote the regular production of prime-time shows here. Those associated with the show contend that its New York origins differentiate "Kate & Allie" from the standard situation comedy produced in Hollywood.

In addition to "Kate & Allie," CBS has developed at least three pilots—sample episodes for prospective series—out of New York. One of them, "Agony," starring Lucie Arnaz as an advice columnist, began shooting at various locations around the city last week.

BOOM IN TV WORK

Neither NBC nor ABC is as involved in New York prime-time series production as CBS, according to network and production officials. But the East Coast projects of all three networks have contributed to an overall boom in television work here.

"Last year was the best year for television production ever in the city, and 1984 will be terrific, too," said Patricia Reed Scott, director, of the Mayor's Office of Film, Theater and Broadcasting. According to Miss Scott, in 1983 there were 54 separate television projects here, including made-for-television films, daytime dramas and series pilots.

A number of factors are fueling this increased activity, according to industry experts. CBS executives say they are seeking to bring new ideas and faces to prime time—especially comedy programs that have been flagging in the ratings—by tapping producers, writers and actors in New York. Cable and pay-television networks such as Home Box Office and Showtime have also been seeking new sources of programming here.

And to accommodate this greater demand, an assortment of new production facilities is copping up around the city—ranging from recently constructed sound stages at the Astoria and Silvercup Studios in Queens to the "West Coast Studios" being built on 11th Avenue, and the National Video Center in the old West Side Airlines Terminal in Manhattan. "Kate & Allie" was taped before a studio audience at the Ed Sullivan Theater on Broadway.

"There has been an explosion of production facilities," said Mr. Kane. "We are now at the point where facilities are no longer an obstacle."

Nevertheless, developing prime-time series outside Hollywood has been difficult because of two widely held prejudices: that New York shows are more costly, and that there are not enough writers and producers in the city to staff a series. The people behind "Kate & Allie," however, contend that their experience demonstrates that such problems are imagined rather than real.

The idea for the show came two years ago from a New York script writer, Sherry Coben. "The show occured to me after a high-school reunion where I watched all these people who were divorced and had children," Miss Coben said. "They seemed so lonely, and I thought it would be nice to do a show about two women who live together out of friendship and mutual need."

CBS executives liked the show, and they said it could be done with the right cast. Mr. Kane and Michael Ogiens, vice president of programs in New York for CBS, recalled that both Susan Saint James and Jane Curtin, who had recently had babies, were now ready to return to work.

The network then recruited Bill Persky, a veteran television producer, who pulled together a staff of New York writers including Bob Randall, a Broadway playwright ("6 Rms Riv Vu"), and Peter Gethers, the executive editor of Villard Books, a division of Random House.

There were practical reasons as well for seeking local talent. Other shows recently produced in New York, such as "Love, Sidney" on NBC, had imported their writing and production staffs from the West Coast, to the network's dismay.

When the first six episodes of "Kate & Allie" were completed two weeks ago, CBS officials were pleased to learn that Mr. Persky had produced the show for slightly less than its budget of an estimated $350,000 per episode. Moreover, the series quickly earned the network's approval for other reasons as well: In tests with sample audiences, it registered the highest score for any situation comedy produced by CBS this year.

"People like both leads, they think the kids are appealing, and they think the show has a new look," said David Poltrack, vice president of research for CBS.

CBS officials and the show's staff believe that such perceptions may stem directly from its having been produced here. "There is a freshness in the writing," said Harvey Shephard, senior vice president of programs for CBS Entertainment. "When you are dealing with people who don't write for television day in and day out, the ideas are a little more imaginative."

The show has also been able to use actors from the New York stage, such as John Heard and Rosemary Murphy. "The faces are different, and they also have a different style," said Miss Saint James. The differences can be found in smaller ways as well, according to the show's writers and producers. Because New Yorkers tend to speak faster, the show has more dialogue; its scripts run about 50 pages instead of the customary 38 for a situation comedy.

But the most obvious glimpse of the show's origins comes at its beginning, a 45-second sliver of amiable banter between Kate and Allie at a different Manhattan location each week.

"I don't think I would have thought about going outside in Los Angeles," said Mr. Persky. "Everybody has seen so much of Los Angeles on television that I don't think there is a palm tree out there that isn't getting a residual."●

"KESY" SWIMMERS TO BE HONORED

HON. JOSEPH M. GAYDOS

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 5, 1984

● Mr. GAYDOS. Mr. Speaker, a group of 105 young people, ranging in age from 4 to 19, will be honored Sunday for marks they have made in swimming competition during 1984.

Just a glance at their record to date is evidence the tribute is well earned. In fact, one of the group's advisers frankly says the team's total achievements this year have never been equaled in local swimming circles.

The Kiski East Suburban YMCA (KESY) swim team will be the guests of honor at a testimonial dinner April 8 and it is expected the affair will draw recognition from local, State, and Federal officials.

Mr. Stanley J. Caraher, president of the team, has furnished me with a brief listing of the swimmers' achievements this season and I think my colleagues will agree the record is impressive.

Won the Girls 1984 Western Pennsylvania District (Y) swim championship.

Won the Boys 1984 Western Pennsylvania District (Y) swim championship.

Won the Western Pennsylvania (Y) League championship. Competing against 14 teams, "KESY" swimmers posted an undefeated 1983-84 season.

Qualified more swimmers, 49, for the State championship than any other western Pennsylvania team.

Qualified 16 swimmers for the LMCA National in Fort Lauderdale, Fla.

Qualified 13 swimmers for the 1984 top 25 National (Y) time standards: J. Klucinec, J. Rumbaugh, W. Klucinec, K. Curran, E. Breman, C. Kline, M. Marchitelli, J. Fink, A. Parke, S. Curran, J. Caraher, M. Shoemaker, and C. Beatty.

Although justifiably proud of what their charges have accomplished, the team's two coaches—William and Deborah Bower—are quick to emphasize that winning is not the club's primary purpose.

"We look on sports as a practice area for life," says Debbie Bower, "the roles they play in sports carry over to life. They learn a lot about honesty, competition, and about themselves."

Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to bring the record of the KESY swimmers to the attention of my colleagues in the Congress of the United States. I know they join me in extending official congratulations to this outstanding organization.●

SUSPEND THE DEPORTATION OF SALVADORAN REFUGEES

HON. MIKE LOWRY

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 5, 1984

● Mr. LOWRY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I am very concerned by the current Immigration and Naturalization Service policy of sending Salvadoran refugees in the United States back to El Salvador, in view of the substantial evidence that these refugees' lives are endangered when they arrive in El Salvador.

It is difficult to obtain full documentation of the degree of risk that our current policy presents to these individuals. However, the Center for Immigration Rights has studied a list of 2,500 deportees. The preliminary results indicate that 50 appeared on death lists compiled by independent Salvadoran human rights organizations. In other words, 2 percent of the deportees studied were killed. Because the records are not always reliable, the total number of victims in this group could be higher. In response to this study, a spokesman for the Immigration and Naturalization Service reportedly stated:

Just because those people were returned and may have become innocent victims of some level of random violence in El Salvador does not mean the judgment on their asylum claims was inaccurate.

I strongly disagree with this view. If we have reason to believe that a policy of deporting refugees from the United States may lead to death for 2 percent of them, it seems to me that a study of this policy is not too much to ask, and that while the study is going on, the policy should be suspended. That is exactly what H.R. 4447 would do: It would suspend the deportation of Salvadorans from the United States pending a study of the conditions they face. Accordingly, I was pleased to join our colleague from Massachusetts, Mr. MOAKLEY, as one of the original cosponsors of this bill. I hope the scheduled hearings on H.R. 4447 will increase the awareness of the serious dangers that face these refugees.

I would also like to bring the attention of the House to two resolutions from my home State concerning this issue. The Washington State Legislature adopted House Joint Memorial 37, which urges the Federal Government to grant extended voluntary departure status for Salvadoran and also Guatemalan refugees in the United States. The Seattle City Council approved a similar resolution. As both resolutions note, local church groups in Washington State feel so strongly about this issue that they have offered sanctuary to these refugees even though the Immigration and Naturalization Service views sanctuary as a violation of the law. The two major Seattle newspapers have also questioned the current policy. As one stated, the refugees are "hapless participants in a deadly game of Salvadoran roulette."

I hope we will all join in support of a change in the current policy. I commend the resolutions by the Washington State Legislature and the Seattle City Council to my colleagues' attention:

WASHINGTON STATE LEGISLATURE HOUSE JOINT MEMORIAL NO. 37

To the Honorable Ronald Reagan, President of the United States, the Secretary of State of the United States, and to the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and to the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States, in Congress assembled:

We, Your Memorialists, the Senate and House of Representatives of the State of Washington, in legislative session assembled, respectfully represent and petition as follows:

Whereas, Hundreds of thousands of Salvadoran, Guatemalan, Afghan, Angolan, and Cuban refugees have fled their homelands as a result of the violent confict now engulfing those countries; and

Whereas, The federal Immigration and Naturalization Service has denied asylum to ninety-five percent of the Salvadoran refugees who have applied; and

Whereas, Numerous church and international human rights agencies have documented the violation of human rights in El Salvador, Guatemala, Afghanistan, Angola, and Cuba, including the threat of death to Salvadoran and Guatemalan refugees who are deported from the United States; and

Whereas, It is estimated that more than five thousand Salvadoran and Guatemalan refugees are in Washington State; and

Whereas, Community organizations and churches are responding to the basic needs of these refugees; and

Whereas, Some airlines have stopped returning deported Salvadorans to El Salvador; and

Whereas, The significant risk of persecution and death for deported Salvadoran or Guatemalan refugees makes it inhumane to enforce their return during this period of violent conflict; and

Whereas, Deportation of Salvadoran or Guatemalan refugees violates the principles upon which our nation was founded; and

Whereas, "Extended voluntary departure" status or safe haven allows refugees to stay in the United States until the conflict in their countries is over; and

Whereas, Refugees from Poland and Ethiopia are currently granted "extended voluntary departure" status or safe haven; and

Whereas, Refugees from Nicaragua and Iran were granted "extended voluntary departure" status when the revolutions in their countries were occurring:

Now, Therefore, Your Memorialists respectfully pray that the United States grant "extended voluntary departure" status or safe haven for refugees from El Salvador and Guatemala to allow them to remain in the United States until conditions stabilize in their homelands and a safe return can be assured.

Be it further resolved, That copies of this Memorial be immediately transmitted to the Honorable Ronald Reagan, President of the United States, the Secretary of State of the United States, the President of the United States Senate, the Speaker of the United States House of Representatives, and each member of Congress from the State of Washington.

SEATTLE CITY COUNCIL RESOLUTION 27035

A resolution expressing the concern of the Mayor and City Council of the City of Seattle for the plight of Salvadoran and Guatemalan refugees in the United States and for the moral dilemma this poses for our citizens and requesting certain action of the President and the Congress of the United States.

Whereas, hundreds of thousands of Salvadoran and Guatemalan refugees have fled their homelands as a result of the violent conflict now engulfing those countries, and

Whereas, it is estimated that over 5,000 Salvadoran and Guatemalan refugees are in Washington State, many of them in Seattle, without legal approval and therefore facing the risk of deportation, and

Whereas, the Immigration and Naturalization Service has denied asylum to 95 percent of the Salvadoran refugees who have applied, and

Whereas, numerous church and international human rights agencies have documented the violation of human rights in El Salvador and Guatemala, including the threat of death to those deported from the United States, and

Whereas, several local churches, because of their deeply felt religious convictions, have offered sanctuary to Salvadoran and Guatemalan refugees despite the fact that the Immigration and Naturalization Service believes that sanctuary is a violation of the law, and

Whereas, Western, Pan American and Mexicana Airlines have all stopped returning deported Salvadorans to El Salvador, and

Whereas, Congress has recommended that the President grant "extended voluntary departure" to Salvadoran refugees, and

Whereas, this program would allow them to stay in the U.S. temporarily until it is safe to return, as is currently being done with Poles and Ethiopians, and

Whereas, the significant risk of persecution and death for deported Salvadoran or Guatemalan refugees makes it inhumane to enforce their return during this period of civil war, and

Whereas, the above conditions would also be addressed by legislation suspending Salvadoran deportations pending a Congressional review of the findings of a study of the conditions facing Salvadoran refugees deported from the U.S. and the conditions for them in neighboring countries,

Now, therefore, it is the sense of the Seattle City Council that a program of "extended voluntary departure" or safe haven should be granted to Salvadoran and Guatemalan refugees to allow them to remain in the United States until conditions stabilize in their homelands and a safe return can be assured, and further, that this shall be communicated to the President and our Congressional delegation.●

HONDURAS TO MOVE REFUGEES AWAY FROM BORDERS

HON. DAVID E. BONIOR

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 5, 1984

● Mr. BONIOR of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, in the past few years, Congress and the people of the United States have become increasingly aware of the suffering of El Salvador. Internationally recognized human rights organizations have documented the fact that nearly 40,000 noncombatant civilians have been killed by Government forces since 1979. Hundreds of thousands of Salvadorans have fled the country, seeking refuge from the political violence.

Over 18,000 Salvadorans are now living as refugees in camps in Honduras where, with the help of international relief organizations, they have built an infrastructure of schools, gardens, water systems, et cetera. Yet, the possibility of seeking safe haven in Honduras is now in jeopardy. The Honduran Government has announced plans to relocate the refugees to a remote area in the interior of Honduras.

I would like to call the attention of my colleagues to the following article from the Miami Herald which describes some of the difficulties this relocation would cause. If the relocation goes forward, thousands of refugees will no longer feel they have access to safe haven in Honduras.

It is time for the United States to address the refugee problem in a responsible manner. We must show a new sensitivity to the human costs of our policies in El Salvador and Honduras. And we must acknowledge the dangers that Salvadorans who have sought refuge in the United States will face if our current policy of deportation continues.

I urge my colleagues to support the legislation introduced by Congressman MOAKLEY, H.R. 4447, which would suspend the deportation of Salvadoran refugees, and would direct the President to report to Congress on whether the humanitarian and security conditions in El Salvador and other Central American countries are safe enough to warrant the return of these refugees.

[From the Miami Herald, Mar. 9, 1984]

HONDURAS TO MOVE REFUGEES AWAY FROM BORDERS

(By Juan O. Tamayo)

TEGUCIGALPA, HONDURAS.—Worried about the security of its borders, the Honduran government is planning to relocate 18,700 refugees—almost all Salvadorans—away from the frontier and into an isolated valley in central Honduras.

The United Nations Office of High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR) grudgingly has endorsed the forced exodus, but asked the government to put in writing its promises of farmland and freedom of movement for the refugees.

The proposed relocation underscores the problems faced by the 18,200 Salvadoran refugees in Honduras—a small part of the 500,000 people estimated to have fled the tiny nation since 1979 to escape its violence.

While Honduras' conservative government is friendly toward the 25,000 refugees who came here from Marxist-ruled Nicaragua, it suspects many of the Salvadorans of helping the leftist guerrillas in their homeland.

The bodies of 12 Salvadoran men and women who had been shot were found last month near the Mesa Grande refugee camp, 40 miles from the Salvadoran border. The Honduran army has said it is investigating the slayings.

UNHCR's Tegucigalpa office said the first phase of the refugee resettlement, to begin in June, would relocate 8,737 Salvadorans and 494 Guatemalans now living in three camps within three miles of the border with their home countries.

The second stage will relocate 9,500 Salvadorans living in Mesa Grande, said UNHCR deputy chief Alfredo del Rio. He stressed that the second stage would start only if the first was judged to be successful.

Del Rio said all the refugees would be resettled near the town of Olanchito, in a fertile but remote and thinly populated valley 140 miles from the Salvadoran border and 111 miles from Guatemala.

The three camps to be emptied—Colomoncagua and San Antonio near El Salvador and El Tesoro near Guatemala—will be turned into "reception centers," where Honduran officials will process newly arrived refugees.

Spokesmen for the Salvadoran refugees, who asked to remain anonymous, charged that the relocation plan was politically motivated and complained it would make it difficult for relatives still in El Salvador to visit them.

They alleged that the border area was being cleared because U.S. and Honduran troops planned to intervene militarily in El Salvador's guerrilla war. Both U.S. and Honduran officials denied any such plans.

About 3,500 troops from the United States, Honduras, El Salvador and Guatemala will hold joint military maneuvers in May and June near Cucuyagua, 28 miles from the Salvadoran border.

The Honduran National Commission on Refugees has denied any political motives for the relocation and said it is designed to move the refugees to an area where they can grow their own food.

Del Rio said UNHCR policy was to resettle refugees away from the border—to protect them as well as to keep them from helping the Salvadoran guerrillas.

Del Rio also said the refugees had a "valid criticism" of the relocation plan because of their experience in Mesa Grande, established in early 1982 after Hondurans shut down the refugee camps in La Virtud and La Guarita, about three miles from the Salvadoran border.

Refugee spokesmen said Honduran government officials had promised that Mesa Grande would be a lasting settlement, where the Salvadorans would farm surrounding lands and become self-sufficient in food.

The camp is now fenced-in and guarded by Honduran soldiers. Refugees need special passes to leave, and have been unable to farm anything more than small vegetable patches.

Del Rio said that because of the problems in Mesa Grande, UNHCR wanted the Honduran government to write down its promises for the Olanchito settlement and legitimize it by cabling the document to all foreign embassies in Tegucigalapa and all Honduran embassies abroad.

He said the Olanchito resettlement area would consist of some 5,000 acres of farmland, to be bought with funds provided by international aid organizations.●

LOOKING AT POLAND AND SCHOOL PRAYER: THE VITAL PREMISE

HON. JACK FIELDS

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 5, 1984

● Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Speaker, for those of us in the House of Representatives who strongly support voluntary prayer in our Nation's public schools, the recent vote in the Senate was a setback but certainly not a defeat of this important effort. Clearly, this vote demonstrates that a majority of Members of the U.S. Senate share my support of and advocacy for allowing prayer in our Nation's schools.

In an effort to further the cause of voluntary school prayer I am enclosing an excellent article recently published in the Washington Times, which I commend to the attention of my colleagues.

In the article, Mr. Joseph Sobran articulately uncovers the fundamental flaw in the argument against voluntary school prayer; that returning prayer, particularly voluntary prayer, to our Nation's schools will in no way infringe upon the most sacredly held right in our country: separation of church and state.

However, the refusal to allow prayer, even voluntary prayer, does insure one result, that the long arm of big brother will continue to sweep away the rights of individuals in this country and subjugate them to the ever-increasing secularism of the Federal Government. By comparing the separation of church and state in our country with the attempted elimination of the church in Poland, Mr. Sobran strikes fear into the heart of any reader against the looming power of the state and the diminishing authority of its citizens.

The text of Mr. Sobran's article follows:

LOOKING AT POLAND AND SCHOOL PRAYER: THE VITAL PREMISE

(By Joseph Sobran)

Yes, it was appalling to learn that the communist rulers were yanking all the crucifixes out of Polish classrooms. But it was downright amazing to realize they had been permitting the crucifixes all this time. Don't they have a Supreme Court?

The new Polish crackdown on religion reflects our own controversy about school prayer. Here, as there, the excuse for secularizing education is justified as "the separation of church and state."

That is a sound principle, but it presupposes a vital premise: the stable division of society into two spheres, private and public, where church and state can exercise spiritual and temporal authority, each made secure by the distinction.

This vital premise is obviously missing in Poland: The state claims unlimited authority over everything. And given this situation, the Polish people know what the "separation" of church and state has to mean: the ultimate elimination of the church.

What are the implications for America? Well, the removal of prayer from the public schools is, in my judgment, basically desirable. The role of the public schools, and the role of the state itself, should be strictly limited to carefully specified secular purposes.

But the vital premise is missing here in America, too. For many parents there is no real alternative to public schools for their children. The American public school system is like an established church: Everyone is taxed to finance it, but anyone who wants an alternative has to pay for that alternative unassisted.

Now this is all wrong. If the public schools are to be secularized as state agencies should be, then at least we should make religious education affordable for those who believe that the most important thing a child can learn is the faith of his fathers.

This is exactly where American liberals draw a blank. They don't really believe there is much to be learned about or from religion. They are willing to subsidize abortion on grounds that those who can't afford it are effectively denied the option, but they don't apply this line of reasoning to parental choice in education. They see even a voucher plan as a fatal compromise, ignoring the generally pluralistic school systems of countries like Canada, Holland, and West Germany.

Not that our secularized schools are modest about their competence. Religion is about the only area they don't claim competence in: They can instill "politically correct" attitudes about race and gender roles, and they can remedy parental "failure" in sex education. "It is no use telling them to mind their own business," C. S. Lewis once wrote in a similar connection. "Our whole lives are their business." And to top off this grim joke on parents, their children are supposed to be made mentally uniform in the name of "pluralism."

The problem goes beyond education, to the growth of the modern liberal state itself. That state expands without clear limit, and its secularism crowds religion out of every area it moves into. In this way it tends, as Mr. Lewis put it, "to make Christianity a private affair while banishing all privacy." So aggressive secularism undermines the premise of genuine separation: It shrinks the area of religious influence to a smaller and smaller residue.

The "separation" of church and state, liberal-style, turns out to mean a rigid segregation of religion from social life, in America as in Poland, on terms chosen unilaterally by the state. It unhappily parallels the old "separate but equal" status of the races—where one race held a monopoly of power over the other.

No wonder religious parents, sensing their second-class status, are refusing to step to the back of the secular bus. They may be wrong about the narrower issue of school prayer, but they certainly know what is being done to them in a deeper sense: They are being robbed of their authority over their own children, at a time when their children need special protection against aggressive cultural pimps and pornographers, who currently flourish thanks to the same Supreme Court that replaced James Madison's version of the Constitution with Madalyn Murray O'Hair's.●

REMOVING OBSTACLES TO OLDER WORKER EMPLOYMENT

HON. EDWARD R. ROYBAL

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 5, 1984

● Mr. ROYBAL. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing legislation to remove yet another obstacle to older worker employment. That obstacle is the present practice of denying pension benefit accruals to those workers who choose to remain employed beyond their 65th birthday.

The problem stems from a Labor Department interpretation (Fed. Reg. vol. 44 No. 103, May 25, 1979) which grants employers the right to discriminate against older workers in their pension plans. The Labor Department's rationale was that requiring employers to contribute to older worker pensions would be too expensive and would inhibit employers from hiring older workers.

This is far from the truth. A study conducted for the Select Committee on Aging by Anna Rapport, a well-known actuarial expert, concluded that "there is no cost justification for discontinuing pension accruals for workers over age 65." Thus, requiring continued accruals would not create a further obstacle to hiring older workers. Rather, it would remove an important obstacle.

When older workers are faced with a benefit reduction simply because they reach age 65, it signals to them that their employer considers their efforts to be less valuable than they once were. At present, roughly one-half of the Nation's employers refuse to contribute to their older employees' pensions. The net result: Workers retire at earlier ages to avoid the stigma and financial penalty associated with discriminatory policies.

Denying pension accruals for work after age 65 is a significant deterent to employment. According to Labor Department estimates, if age discrimination in pension accruals were abolished, as my bill would do, by the year 2000 more than 68,000 older workers would remain employed who would otherwise have retired prematurely and would have begun drawing social security and other retirement benefits.

When older workers retire early because of discrimination, it represents a net loss to the Nation's productivity, to State and Federal revenues and to social security contributions. The Social Security Administration estimates that denying pension accruals to older workers results in a net loss—due to earlier retirements—to the social security trust funds of $1.3 billion annually by the year 2000 and $3.5 billion by 2020—in 1983 dollars. The losses in State and Federal revenues and lost productivity are many times these figures.

It is time that this Congress addresses the conflicting messages we are sending to our older workers. On the one hand, we fight against mandatory retirement because older workers are healthy and capable of a continued contribution to this Nation. But, despite our proclaimed support for the virtues of older workers we have ignored the blatant discrimination in pension accruals they face if they wish to work past age 65.

The bill I am introducing today will rectify this inequity and send a clear message to the older workers of America that we truly value their contribution and support their full participation in the labor force for which they will be compensated without regard to their age.●

OCS MORATORIUMS HARM NATION'S BEST ENERGY HOPE

HON. JACK FIELDS

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 5, 1984

● Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Speaker, as one who has consistently support efforts to improve our national defense and national security through greater domestic energy independence, I remain most concerned about the prospects of another moratorium being imposed on the Outer Continental Shelf.

I find it surprising that so many of my colleagues have, of late, been suffering from a tremendous loss of memory. It was not so long ago when we were all waiting in lines at the gas station because the Arabs had once again embargoed oil imports to this country. And 1979 was not the first time. The embargo of 1973 set in motion a national effort to explore and drill for more domestic sources of natural gas and oil in addition to developing other sources of energy, particularly renewables and encouraging conservation efforts by all Americans. We have, as a nation, made great progress since the time of the first Arab oil embargo.

Unfortunately, I fear we as policymakers are being lulled into a false sense of energy security and worse, many of my colleagues are falling prey to the populist pressures of the environmentalist's argument which opposes any leasing on the Outer Continental Shelf.

The only obvious result of this shortsighted thinking is to place us back in a position of being held hostage to foreign oil supplies. This is most unfortunate when an obvious alternative is available. I encourage my colleagues in the interest of strengthening national security to forego the rhetoric and propaganda of those opposed to OCS leasing and exercise the alternative of efficient development of the Outer Continental Shelf. The OCS, according to the U.S. Geological Service and Minerals Management Services, has been determined to contain 26 billion barrels of recoverable oil. This supply would certainly go a long way toward displacing our daily OPEC import level of 700,000 barrels of oil.

Activity on the Outer Continental Shelf has an excellent safety and environmental record. Over $250 million has been spent on insuring the safe, efficient, and timely development of OCS resources. Toward this end, I commend to the attention of my colleagues the following article by John Threet, vice president of Shell Oil Co.

The text of the article is as follows:

OCS MORATORIUMS HARM NATION'S BEST ENERGY HOPE

Today, I want to tell you that the risk of a reappearance of the severe energy shortages of the 1970s in Boston and the rest of the country is real. I want to give you my reasons for that blunt statement and to let you know history does not have to repeat itself.

First, my reasons for concern:

America will continue to depend on oil and natural gas for most of its energy for decades to come. Today, about 69 percent of the energy we use comes from crude oil and natural gas, 22 percent from coal, 5 percent from hydroelectric power, 4 percent from nuclear power and less than 1 percent from solar and other renewable sources. Forecasts by industry and other experts predict these shares will change only slowly.

About one-third of this country's oil supplies, more than 5 million barrels a day, now come from foreign sources—the same percentage as in the 1973 crisis.

Oil imports have begun to rise again. As the economy improves and the demand for energy rises, so will oil imports. That increases our risk of oil supply disruptions and severely damages our economy. Eighty percent of last year's U.S. trade deficit of almost $70 billion was represented by the cost of imported oil.

We are very vulnerable. The Iran-Iraq war and hostilities in Lebanon demonstrate the continuing danger of a cutoff of Mideastern supplies. In addition, the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries controls three-fourths of the free world's known oil reserves. Drivers waited in gasoline lines in 1973 and 1979 because of a shortfall of only a few hundred thousand barrels of oil per day.

Finally, our vulnerability is increasing. Proved reserves of crude oil and natural gas in the United States dropped by about one-third during the 1970s. Each year, the U.S. uses more domestic oil and natural gas than it finds. We will have to find 32 billion barrels of domestic crude oil over the next 10 years, just to replace what we are using. That volume is more than today's proved reserves.

If the risks to our national energy supply are so great, can't we do something to lessen that? We can. And the answer is obvious—less dependency on foreign sources. But are there enough potential undiscovered domestic reserves of oil and gas to make a real difference? The answer is an unqualified yes. And the greatest promise is in our offshore.

Shell's best estimates show that about 60 percent of future oil discoveries and about 35 percent of future natural gas discoveries will come from the outer continental shelf of Alaska and the lower 48. Only 12 percent of all domestic crude oil and 27 percent of our natural gas comes from offshore now.

LACK OF DEVELOPMENT

The lack of development of U.S. offshore resources has been due to a piecemeal approach to offshore leasing until recently. In 1978 Congress mandated that the U.S. accelerate, in an orderly manner, the offering of the OCS for petroleum exploration and production. A new five-year leasing program was initiated in 1982 to inventory the OCS and accomplish the objective set by Congress.

I've given you the reasons for my concern over our energy supply situation and why the offshore holds the greatest promise to reduce the risks we face. But amazingly, the nation may not benefit from this great promise.

The U.S. Congress should be moving toward increased independence from imported oil. It is not.

Apparently, some congressmen from coastal states are responding to understandable but unjustified fears of constituents. Their constituents are unaware of the offshore environmental record, of the compatibility of offshore petroleum operations with the fishing industry and of the dangers of increased dependence on oil imports.

Other congressmen—from inland states, for example—see no link between offshore drilling and their constituents' interests, despite the national need for energy. Still other congressmen respond to extremists who want a no-risk, no-growth society, disregarding whether such an elitist goal is in the national interest.

Then there are some congressmen who accept the position of offshore drilling opponents without demanding reasonable alternatives for replacing the energy that would result from offshore leasing. These opponents' goal is to avoid any environmental risk at any cost, letting others worry about energy.

GOOD RECORD

But the dangers from offshore drilling and production are far more "perceived" than "real", as the petroleum industry's offshore record clearly shows.

Industry's performance is well-documented. Briefly, since offshore oil and gas operations began, over 30,000 wells have been drilled in state and federal waters off our coasts, producing more than 10 billion barrels of oil and nearly 72 trillion cubic feet of natural gas.

The 1969 Santa Barbara Channel spill is the only major spill from these operations in which significant amounts of oil reached shore. And scientific studies show that no lasting environmental damage resulted.

That's an outstanding record. Moreover, offshore operations in federal waters are highly regulated and are constantly monitored by government agencies, as they should be. Coupled with this is the recognition by the industry that it does not and cannot conduct its offshore operations in a vacuum. It must coexist with and cooperate with federal and state governments and with the fishermen who share the offshore waters.

In spite of these facts, opponents of offshore leasing are trying to block or slow such development through litigation and congressional action. Unfortunately, Congress has repeatedly acceded to their demands.

LEASE MORATORIUMS

Moratoriums have been imposed on millions of offshore acres believed to be high in oil and natural gas potential. And those moratoriums have been put in place without the benefit of open discussion either in the congressional committees with offshore leasing oversight responsibilities or on the floors of Congress.

Instead, the moratoriums have been attached to Interior Department yearly appropriations bills. In fiscal year 1984, 53 million offshore acres were placed off limits through this side-door mechanism. That's 13 million acres more than all the OCS acreage offered during the 1950s, 1960s and 1970s combined.

Furthermore, those 53 million acres are believed to contain oil and gas equivalent estimated to be nearly 15 billion barrels of oil—almost four times the amount of oil in America's emergency storage reserve. And every year that amount of petroleum is withheld, the cost to the U.S. economy is estimated to be more than $1.5 billion.

We are continually concerned that a program so vital to our energy future as the OCS program will be made ineffective by these types of congressional actions. Congress must act responsibly in these matters. Otherwise, the risk of potential future oil supply disruptions is increased.

We now have a new secretary of the interior, William Clark, who has announced his intentions to work for a smoother OCS leasing process within the framework of the present five-year leasing program. I hope the secretary will be successful in these efforts so that our nation can look forward to a more secure energy supply future.●

ANOTHER SETBACK FOR HUMAN RIGHTS IN EL SALVADOR

HON. MICHAEL D. BARNES

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 5, 1984

● Mr. BARNES. Mr. Speaker, Vice President BUSH's laudable effort to get progress on the problem of the Salvadoran death squads suffered another setback the other day, when a key witness to the murder of two Americans, Capt. Eduardo Alfonso Avila, was released from custody without having provided any information on the crime.

While there has been a reduction in death squad activity recently, the Avila case shows how hard it is to make any meaningful progress in actually dismantling the death squad structure. Little progress has been made on this front, which means that the structure is still there, ready to be activated the next time the Salvadoran right wing fears further progress in negotiations or reforms.

In a recent editorial, the Washington Post rightly asks why President Reagan is putting up with the absence of progress in this area, why he is up here asking for emergency aid when everyone knows that the Salvadorans are doing nothing about the murders of Americans—to say nothing of the murders of 40,000 Salvadorans.

It is a good question, and one that I hope we in Congress will be asking ourselves as we consider the administration's requests.

The editorial follows:

[From the Washington Post, Apr. 3, 1984]

A WITNESS GOES FREE

The key witness to the murder of two American land reform advisers in El Salvador in 1981 escaped the coils of the law the other day. He had been detained on an unrelated minor charge right after George Bush came to put some heat on the Salvadoran government on the matter of the despicable death squads. The two advisers, along with the four American churchwomen murdered in 1980, have been, unsurprisingly, high on the list of American concerns. It looked, last December, as though the vice president's prompting could make a difference. But now the man Americans believe helped plan the 1981 killings, meeting with one gunman minutes before the crime and lending a windbreaker to conceal the murder weapon, is free.

It's simple to understand the calculus at work here. The armed forces—which shield, if they do not actually harbor, the killers in the two American cases and in Salvadoran cases beyond counting—tend to protect their own. The national tradition and the practice of intimidation and bribery put them effectively beyond civilian political or judicial control. The military sees the reluctance even of most of President Reagan's critics to cut off El Salvador because of the death squads. It recalls that at crucial moments the United States has flinched—as when, for example, the White House overruled Ambassador Deane Hinton's protests. Stonewalling and token concessions on the part of the Salvadorans have ensured that none of those who killed the Americans has been brought to justice. None.

Looking for a way to put heat on the Salvadoran military, Congress last year withheld some of the military aid it had voted, conditioning full delivery on Salvadoran performance in the American cases. The administration then abandoned in practice the fiction of the independence of the Salvadoran judicial system, and began applying heavy political pressure, including the Bush mission. A year later however, Salvador is releasing witnesses, and the administration is asking for new emergency aid.

How can this be? Why should Ronald Reagan not tell the new Salvadoran president that one matter must be disposed of before any other can be addressed. Such an unambiguous presidential commitment would be something new. It is disgusting that the Salvadorans are getting away with their pretense of pursuing the murderers while everyone knows they are doing nothing. Ronald Reagan was supposed to be the kind of president—at least so he said—who wouldn't put up with this sort of thing.●

UNDERSTANDING THE VOICE OF AMERICA

HON. DON RITTER

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 5, 1984

● Mr. RITTER. Mr. Speaker, I am enclosing a copy of a recent interview with VOA Director Ken Tomlinson, that was published in the February 4, 1984, issue of Human Events and I am requesting that it be reprinted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

I have always been a strong supporter of the VOA and believe that they could be far more effective if given the necessary equipment and support. The enclosed interview illustrates the constant struggle the VOA encounters in getting the news and information out to the world. In fact, I think it is a crying shame that too few dollars are appropriated to the VOA by Congress. Given the necessary resources, the VOA could be a major component of our foreign policy. It is ironic that the Soviets spend more money jamming our broadcasts than the entire budget of the VOA. Yet under the directorship of Ken Tomlinson, I believe the Voice has made significant strides in upgrading their programing and raising their respectability. Ken Tomlinson is one person who deeply understands the importance that the Voice can have in directing objective news and information throughout the world. He and his able staff are to be commended.

I am hopeful that my colleagues will read the enclosed interview and consider the points raised in the discussion.

The interview follows:

WE'RE PUTTING THE VOICES OF AMERICA ON THE VOICE OF AMERICA

Q. Mr. Tomlinson, a very basic question: Why the Voice of America? Specifically, could you give us a little historical background on the VOA and what its charter envisioned as the purpose of the service?

A. It's difficult for many Americans to grasp what it is like to live and function in a totalitarian society, or even through much of the Third World in terms of gaining information about what is really going on in the world.

We live in a media-saturated society, people get one or more newspapers a day, they subscribe to numerous periodicals, you have radio news during the day, television in the morning and evening. But it's not like that in major parts of the world and people depend on the Voice of America and a handful of other Western broadcasters for access to the truth, access to what basically is happening in the world. There's also the importance of reaching the people even in strict totalitarian societies. It's important for us to be able to broadcast the truth to the people of the world. Where there is truth, there is hope for a better tomorrow.

Voice of America went on the air during World War II. We said in our first broadcast that the news may be good from the standpoint of the United States—it may be bad—but we're going to broadcast the truth. Congress enshrined that concept in the charter, in a Public Law in the 1970s, and we are required at the Voice of America to give the news objectively and comprehensively.

We are required to broadcast about America and about its institutions; we are required to broadcast the views of the United States government and responsible opposition positions. I have no problem with this concept because through ultimate professionalism, through making sure that our news is balanced within the American political spectrum, we're performing a service that I think the vast majority of Americans want us to perform.

One problem at the Voice of America in the past has been that we have not always recognized what is truly important about America and its institutions. Sometimes we've spent a lot of time broadcasting about the splendor of the Rocky Mountains, or the Great Lakes, or natural resources—broadcasting about things instead of ideas. What makes this country different is ideas and concepts of freedom which have produced this dynamic economic system unmatched in the world.

When I first went to the Voice of America, the leader of our African division happened to mention that the two most frequently asked questions in the tens of thousands of letters we receive from Africa are: Why does the United States not have governmental coups, and why is the United States so economically prosperous?

If we answer those questions on the Voice of America, we will have served a great purpose both for Americans and the people of the world.

Q. The charge has been made that the VOA has an ambiguous mandate and that the staffing arrangement is somewhat schizophrenic in that the VOA is staffed by political appointees like yourself, by career foreign service officers and by professional journalists and that through the years there's been a lot of ambiguity as to whether the mission of the VOA is to provide news, or whether it is to further the foreign policy aims of the American administration. How do you respond to that?

A. I think the greatest responsibility of the Voice of America is to practice what I call ultimate journalism. we have instituted during the Reagan Administration an editorial policy for the Voice of America. This government has a chance to speak in the grand tradition of a newspaper editorial page. During this Administration, those editorials have been what could be called tough: on East-West issues, on protecting our rights, on why the West is prosperous and totalitarian nations are not.

But we think it has been very important to isolate where the government has official input into the Voice of America to the editorial page. I think it's potentially hazardous to the Voice if our news and current affairs broadcasting is subject, for example, to State Department policy constraints. It is this type of government involvement in our product that gave us periods of time when broadcasts about Solzhenitsyn were alleged to have been ordered off the Voice of America. It is this kind of policy-oriented thinking that stops the flow of ideas and thoughts that will make our broadcasting of significant meaning to the people of the world.

There are many ramifications to this issue and it goes back to the law that governs VOA. What is meant when that law speaks of "balance"? I submit that balance does not lie somewhere between Washington and Moscow. I submit that balance is within the American political spectrum—within the spectrum of Western values.

When we say that our news should be comprehensive, does that mean we should dwell on the negatives about this country? Absolutely not. If we take a current affairs look at the issue of unemployment in this country, it should be in the context of the world economic situation. We should expect the full story to be covered—and that includes an indication of what economic system (i.e., the free market) has produced a measure of prosperity for the people and what economic system (i.e., socialism) has not achieved. But this can best be done by strict adherence to the truth—by calling the plays as they occur in strict adherence to journalistic professionalism.

Q. So I take it that you would not go along with those people who suggest that what is needed is greater government control over broadcasts of the VOA.

A. President Reagan has said on many occasions something to the effect that we shouldn't turn to government to solve all problems because too often government is the problem. I think greater government control of VOA broadcasts would be disastrous.

As I said, it was because of interference from elsewhere in government that people at least perceived in the 1970s that it was not healthy to have Alexander Solzhenitsyn on our Russian service. Now certainly, in our editorials, we are required to convey the policies of the United States. During the Reagan Administration those editorials are going to be forceful in advocating the values of the West. During another administration they might not be so hardline. But in news and current affairs, if you start tailoring that programming to conform with narrow policy considerations, you lose the spark of a free flow of ideas that will enable VOA to inspire audiences around the world.

When I came in, I said we want to make sure the Voice of America reflected the voices of America. That means when we have commentators, that we have, for instance, Allan Ryskind of Human Events and Rick Hertzberg of the New Republic.

This principle is an extension of the philosophy on which this nation was founded. The founders believed that people, when exposed to a diversity of information and opinion, could decide for themselves—and do it wisely. That is precisely what we propose to do in broadcasting facts and information and ideas to the people of the world.

Q. The Voice of America has two sister organizations, Radio Liberty and Radio Free Europe. What are the distinctions in the mandates of these three?

A. At the Voice of America we are reflecting the values and institutions of the U.S. to the world. RFE and RL are surrogate radios, broadcasting as if Radio Liberty were inside the Soviet Union, or Radio Free Europe Polish service were in Poland. They are broadcasting to those countries primarily about what has happened in those countries.

Q. You mentioned Alexander Solzhenitsyn. He has been, at least until recently, a very strong critic of the programming of the VOA, and I have here an extensive interview with him conducted, I think, in 1981. I'd just like to read a few condensed versions of the charges that he made at that time.

He says, "Your radio broadcasts do not give our people the spiritual help they need." And he goes on to say that they don't give them the information they need to have about what's going on inside the Soviet Union.

Specifically, in regard to his book, Gulag Archipelago, he says, "What did the Voice of America do? They went with the agreement and forbade the reading of Gulag Archipelago to Russia. More than that, for several years it was forbidden to quote Solzhenitsyn on the Voice of America so as not to harm Communist propaganda. This means my book was written for Russians, millions of copies were read in the West, but it should not be read in our motherland because otherwise the Voice of America would spoil relations with the Soviet Union."

Would such a criticism still be accurate?

A. Heavens, no. I don't know the full details of what happened in the 1970s in terms of coverage of this most significant figure on the international and American scene, but I can certainly say this: The words and works of Alexander Solzhenitsyn are on the Voice of America today. Coverage of events involving him is on the Voice of America today and will continue. To do otherwise violates that law that requires VOA to engage in "comprehensive" coverage of the news.

We have increased serious programming focusing on the most important events and issues of the day. What is really happening in the Soviet Union? Afghanistan? What is the situation with minorities in the U.S.S.R.? What about the problems of alcoholism in the Soviet Union? Journalistically speaking, these are among the most significant stories in the world today.

I'm pleased to say that we've had an increase in religious broadcasting on the Voice of America, including programs to the Soviet Union. Last Christmas we had the first worldwide broadcast, in English, of a Christmas religious service. This past Thanksgiving we had the first worldwide broadcast of a religious service on that occasion.

Initially people thought that this would create controversy for VOA, and I said that's absurd. We're required to reflect America's institutions. We've required to reflect what's important about America, and religion plays a very, very important part in American society. The concept of freedom of religion and freedom of worship is absolutely essential to what this country is all about.

National Public Radio rushed into the Voice of America last Christmas just before we did that first Worldwide English broadcast and asked if people were not complaining at the Voice of America because of this religious service. And I said yes, I did hear someone complaining in the hallways, but I didn't pay a great deal of attention to that person because he was also muttering, "Bah, humbug!" The NPR reporter broke up. Unfortunately we never heard the interview on the air.

We will continue to have an appropriate emphasis on religion at VOA. In Poland, for example, when the government, under martial law, removed Mass from Warsaw radio and television, we began weekly broadcasts to Poland of Polish Mass services conducted in this country. What we're doing is most appropriate to the traditions of the Voice.

Q. In another criticism, Mr. Solzhenitsyn says, "Your broadcasts are conducted so primitively that they give a false picture of your country. They speak about the most superficial, the most trite things, so that our people have a lower opinion of the American people than the American people deserve."

He continues, "For instance, I will tell you that there are three different jazz programs, then a separate program of pop music, a separate program on dance music, and a separate youth program on which all this is repeated. But it is such a mistake. Perhaps those people who are interested in jazz might turn it off five minutes later and hear something besides jazz. But the thing is that we have very few people who are interested in jazz. They don't need your programs which are jammed because they have at their disposal all the world jazz programs which no one jams. They can hear these programs perfectly. So you do not attract any listeners that way, you spend only valuable air time on nonsense and frivolousness."

A. I became interested in the issue of the Voice of America when I was living in Europe in the 1970s, traveling in Europe, Africa and the Middle East, with a shortwave radio as my constant companion.

I did not think that broadcasting on VOA was sufficiently relevant to what was happening in the world. I did not think that we had a proper emphasis on hard news and especially a proper emphasis on current affairs. I was also concerned that in listening to VOA, I didn't hear the significant voices of America.

Anyone who traveled around the world in recent years has heard complaints that VOA listeners could not count on receiving in-depth coverage of the most significant issues and events of the day. Instead, VOA programming all too often spotlighted features on roller skating in New York and the like—programming which simply did not live up to the purpose of VOA.

I think we've taken care of a good deal of that. We've had on our flagship station, Worldwide English, a significant change in our programming. For example, we've moved away from 1950s disc jockey shows in the morning to news and current affairs broadcasting. Our new program "Focus" each day delivers the voices of America on important issues of the time. Other program changes ensure that the most significant articles, books and trends are assessed by articulate representatives of the American political spectrum.

Pausing to focus, though, on Mr. Solzhenitsyn's comments in years past, I believe our broadcasting, in English and in Russian, is more relevant today.

In a jamming situation, where people are trying mightily to hear what is happening in the world, you obviously need a primary focus on serious programming. Music, though, has always been, and always will be, an important part of the Voice of America because the arts also reflect what this country is all about.

We have had literally a generation of people who have come to know and love jazz through Willis Conover and this important Willis Conover program must continue on VOA. We just have to make sure that people know when they can tune in to the Voice of America for news and current affairs, and know when they can tune in to Voice of America for music, and not try to mix them all together.

Q. One final criticism that Mr. Solzhenitsyn makes: He says, "You limit even simple information about current events. In matters of foreign policy you are being overscrupulous about your use of sources, and with Afghanistan, for instance, and insofar as the internal situation in the Soviet Union is concerned, you have been concentrating on material provided by dissidents from Moscow." He says that this scrupulousness about sources is limiting the news you can broadcast about the Soviet Union to the Soviet people.

A. I came to the Voice of America from the Reader's Digest, which in the last decade has been responsible for some of the most significant journalism produced in the Western world. John Barron's books on the KGB. The Barron-Paul book in Cambodia. Claire Sterling's book supplement on the plot to kill the pope—to name a few examples.

The Reader's Digest is far stricter about confirming sources and stories than is the Voice of America. The bottom line is that it's absolutely essential for accuracy and that you check sources. In fact, I frankly wish we had the resources here at the Voice of America to have further checks on our stories because my great concern is not dashing out with the news to the people of the world. My great concern is making sure that when we broadcast something that it's correct. That's always been the concern of the Reader's Digest and it should be the concern of the Voice of America.

Let me say that I did have a recent and very pleasant visit with Mrs. Solzhenitsyn. We have significantly upgraded our broadcast at the Voice of America in our Russian service, and Mrs. Solzhenitsyn said that that upgrading has been noted. The Solzhenitsyn family listens to Russian language broadcasts of the Voice of America. I believe we've moved to a period where the quality of broadcast at VOA is stronger than ever in its history, and I think people across the spectrum will be recognizing this.

In the Russian service, for example, we're going now with a series of programs called "Conversations with Rostropovich," the great Mstislav Rostropovich who is conductor of the National Symphony Orchestra, and who emigrated from the Soviet Union in the 1970s. He, too, has been a critic of VOA broadcasting in years past.

I just wish it were possible for a cross-section of Americans to listen to this program today. It's patterned after the significant Eric Severeid interviews with Eric Hoffer in the mid-'60s. Mr. Rostropovich talks with Mark Pomar, the new head of our Russian service, about the differences in what is happening in the USSR, the differences in his life, the differences in music. These programs are absolutely extraordinary, and while you are in this building I hope you have a chance to glance at some transcripts. That's what international broadcasting is all about.

Q. It's government policy, I understand, to forbid the reproduction of broadcasts of Voice of America material inside the United States. What is the reason for this restriction?

A. The laws governing the Voice of America and its parent, the United States Information Agency, were passed in the early 1950s when the memories of the 1930s and Nazi Germany were still fresh in the minds of American lawmakers. It was a strict prohibition against any domestic dissemination of a VOA product.

If a reporter, if an American, writes me and says I understand you're broadcasting such and such, I'd like to take a look at it, incredibly, I have to say no. I can't mail it to you. You can come into this building and read the transcripts. Frankly, I think this law should be revised. We should be able to answer legitimate queries about what we're broadcasting on the Voice.

Q. We've talked a lot about the Voice of America. You have a counterpart in the Soviet Union in Radio Moscow. Can you describe Radio Moscow's purpose, its capabilities, its programing, etc.?

A. Well, Radio Moscow has softened a bit in recent years from something that was simply preposterous in propaganda to a product which was until recently slicker. Now it's moved back a bit in terms of its propaganda posture.

But Radio Moscow represents everything that ineffective international broadcasting symbolizes. It is pure propaganda for the Soviet system. You'll never hear anything about any problems in the Soviet Union. It's rare that any event in the Western world is accurately conveyed, and that's why Radio Moscow is far more powerful throughout the world—and has a far more powerful signal throughout the world—than the Voice of America. It broadcasts in twice the number of languages around the world as the Voice of America, and on far more frequencies around the world than the Voice of America, but it cannot touch the influence and significance of the VOA.

Q. Regarding the quality of your broadcasting and the changes made, I note that the Solzhenitsyn family is not alone. The Financial Times of London, for instance, recently quotes Dean Watkins to the effect, "I find the left-wing, anti-business, anit-free market bias that pervaded news and features of the VOA during the Ford and particularly the Carter periods, has now largely disappeared. To me, the VOA has become approximately as neutral as the BBC is."

How did this happen?

A. Our broadcasts are better because we have, I think, a rising tide of professionalism in this institution and I think we've also taken seriously our theme to put the voices of America on the Voice of America.

The traditional approaches at VOA was what I called a one-microphone concept. What we needed at VOA was to have a balanced reflection of American thought and opinion. Then, of course, we needed to focus on the significant issues in the world today.

I say that we're going to institutionalize balance in my tenure at VOA—and that has surprised many people in the professional journalism community. A Reagan appointee, an appointee who for many years has made sure he had his weekly copy of Human Events, is institutionalizing balance and in doing so will ensure that the people of the world are given access to the ideas that have made this country great.

Q. During the past year we've heard a great deal about the Voice of America's antiquated broadcasting facilities. How did the facilities get to be in this sorry state and what's being done to change the situation?

A. You've heard the expression "benign neglect." I think that explains why the Voice of America has been allowed to deteriorate over the course of many years. It is astounding to think that more than 35 percent of our transmitters are over 30 years old an virtually all of our transmitters are older than 15 years. Our antennas, and other equipment, the same. We're sitting now in a studio which was built in the middle 1950's. You have few college stations in America which operate in anything like these conditions.

Why have these conditions not changed? Why has the Voice of America not kept up with the state of the art despite the importance of its mission? One thing I've learned in my service is that it is exceedingly difficult to bring change to government. Unlike the private sector, government is not prepared or structured for shifts in emphasis and change in the way things are done.

If, for example, the VOA construction budget has been virtually nonexistent over the course of years, then putting money into that budget proves to be exceedingly difficult because we've never done it that way before. Modernizing the Voice of America? We've never done that before is unfortunately the reaction in many corners of the federal bureaucracy.

But we have built up incredible momentum in these months to have a meaningful long-term modernization at the Voice of America. We've had that shift because my boss, Charles Wick, the director of USIA, is a very forceful man and he is able to shift government priorities in a very significant way. The ultimate weapon, of course, has been the President of the United States—going on nationwide radio, saying that we need the same kind of effort which enabled us to overcome the gap in the space race, to erase the gap in transmitter power and strength in international broadcasting.

Much like building space vehicles in the 1960s, you can't press a button and immediately design and install transmitter facilities and antennas, and all you need for the kind of quality sound that we must have in American broadcasting. It will take years, but we must begin today. I don't believe that bureaucratic inertia will be able to stop our momentum.

At the beginning of 1983, the VOA had among all the engineers involved in running its system only 20 engineers with college degrees, and not necessarily degrees in engineering. Now, granted, college degrees are not required to engineer and run an old system like VOA's. In fact, our people have done an amazing job with the equivalent of baling wire and chewing gum keeping the Voice of America on the air.

But if you look toward a futuristic state of the art system, you also need to add engineers who can plan that system. We now, thanks to the Reagan Administration's supplemental appropriation, have added more than 60 engineers, most of whom have graduate degrees, and we are adding more every week. This country would not have had a space program without futuristic engineers and we can't have VOA modernization without the same.

Q. Mr. Wick and you are said to have proposed a modernization plan entailing a $1.2-billion expenditure over six years. What are the prospects of this being approved?

A. I think the prospects are good. We have planned and are putting finishing touches on proposals for something like a six-year modernization program, something in the neighborhood of $1 billion or more. This will ensure that people do not have to strain and twirl their radio dials to get VOA in significant places.

Q. After a long struggle, President Reagan finally got Radio Marti approved by the U.S. Congress, and whether or not you wanted to have anything to do with that, you have been given the task of setting it up. What is the purpose of Radio Marti and how do you foresee managing it?

A. The President proposed that Radio Marti be placed under the Board for International Broadcasting, headed by Frank Shakespeare. We all would have preferred to see that happen because Radio Marti was designed for surrogate broadcasting, like Radio Free Europe and Radio Liberty.

In placing the Radio Marti Program in the Voice of America, it is going to be more difficult to get the service on the air because, unlike BIB, we are required to observe Civil Service rules. Sometimes we can find ways to make those rules a little more flexible, but still it's going to take longer to get on the air.

I think we can overcome all the administrative problems that will beset us, all the start-up problems that will hamper us, because the concept of broadcasting the truth, broadcasting of what is happening in Cuba, what is happening to Castro's forces around the world—all this is so exciting as to propel us to overcome the obstacles. Imagine how it would be for you if you lived in Cuba to be able to tune in to a radio station and find out what is really going on in areas affecting your personal interest. This is an extraordinary challenge and I think we'll fulfill it.

As is the case with engineers and modernization, the quality of Mati programs will depend in large part on the quality of people—especially the research people—we are able to involve in this effort.

Q. Castro has threatened to jam Radio Marti's broadcasts and fears have been expressed by some, including some members of Congress, that this jamming is going to seriously affect American broadcasting. Is there anything to that fear, do you think?

A. We will have to wait and see. I believe that it is important to broadcast the truth to the people of Cuba and that we must as soon as possible.●

MON VALLEY COUNCIL TO HONOR DR. CARNEY

HON. JOSEPH M. GAYDOS

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 5, 1984

● Mr. GAYDOS. Mr. Speaker, on Wednesday, May 16, the Mon Valley Progress Council, which serves parts of four counties in western Pennsylvania, will honor Dr. Dennis J. Carney, chairman of the board of Wheeling-Pittsburgh Steel Corp., at a testimonial dinner in the city of Monessen, Pa.

The affair is public recognition of Dr. Carney's commitment to preserving the steel industry in the Mon Valley, his leadership in reviving the operations of his company and in saving thousands of jobs at a time when other firms were closing their doors and laying off their workers.

Robert Logue, executive director of the progress council, sums up Dr. Carney's value to the steel industry and the Mon Valley very succinctly: "Had Dr. Carney turned his back on this region, it could well have been an economic disaster."

Specifically, the council credits Dr. Carney with his firm's decision to invest over $100 million in a new rail mill at Monessen and another $45 million for a continuous caster plant there. In addition, millions of dollars more were spent to upgrade facilities at plants in Monessen and Allenport.

Dr. Carney has strong ties with the valley. He was born there, in Charleroi, just across the river from the Monessen mill, and after graduating from Pennsylvania State University with a degree in metallurgy he began his career in steel with United States Steel Corp. in 1942.

Except for a stint with the U.S. Navy during World War II, Dr. Carney spent the next 32 years steadily climbing the corporate ladder at United States Steel. Then, in 1974, he launched his second career, joining Wheeling-Pittsburgh as vice president of operations. A year later, he was elected executive vice president and a member of the board of directors, assuming full responsibility for all steelmaking operations, engineering and industrial relations.

His rise to the top, thereafter, was rapid. He became president and chief operating officer in 1976; chief executive officer in 1977; and chairman of the board in 1978.

The list of his accomplishments and honors bestowed upon him is far too lengthy to insert into the RECORD but I would like to touch on some highlights.

He was a member of the first U.S. technical exchange task force sent to Russia in 1957 to study steel production there. He has written numerous technical papers which have won him acclaim throughout the industry. In 1978 he was awarded the Benjamin F. Fairless Award for distinguished achievement in iron and steel production and a year later received a Distinguished Life Membership in the American Society of Metals for outstanding contribution to the advancement of the industry.

Mr. Speaker, Dr. Carney is no stranger to Washington. He has appeared many times before House and Senate subcommittees to give testimony on conditions and situations facing the domestic steel industry. His experience, knowledge and insight has been of great help to the Congressional Steel Caucus in its efforts to save and strengthen the Nation's basic steel industry.

I applaud the Mon Valley Council of Progress for its decision to honor Dr. Carney and ask my colleagues in the Congress of the United States to join in extending official congratulations to him on this occasion.●

MISS ELIZABETH YODER APPRECIATION WEEK

HON. CLARENCE D. LONG

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 5, 1984

● Mr. LONG of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, today I wish to bring to the attention of my colleagues a constituent of mine who has contributed enormously to the field of education in Maryland, Miss Elizabeth Yoder. Miss Yoder has given a lifetime of dedication and hard work to the Maryland public school system. I would like to describe here just a few of her many contributions.

Miss Yoder began her teaching career at Upper Falls Elementary School in 1936. Over the next 16 years, she also taught at Carroll Manor Elementary School and Loch Raven Elementary School. In 1952, she took on her current position as assistant principal of Villa Cresta Elementary School. Throughout the years, her devotion to quality education, her caring and compassion for others, and her gentle temperament has endeared her to everyone she has known. One of her coworkers has described Miss Yoder as one who "* * * has always been respected and loved by all who have been fortunate enough to have met her. Regardless of how busy her schedule may be, Miss Yoder has always been available for faculty, parents, and students whenever they have needed her."

Outside of her commitment to education, Miss Yoder has been extremely involved in community activities. She has been a volunteer for the Manor Care Nursing Home in Towson and also has worked with her church on their project to maintain the Long Green Cemetery. According to a longtime friend, a side to Miss Yoder that is not as well known to her colleagues is her generosity and concern for needy families of our area. Whenever Miss Yoder hears of a family in need of emotional or financial help, she is quick to respond with all the aid she can provide. Not one to publicize her own humanitarian efforts, it is only those closest to Miss Yoder who are aware of how much she has given to those around her.

Miss Yoder goes beyond being a leader in the field of education. She is a model citizen. Her concern for the education of our children and for the general welfare of our society has been so impressive that the faculty and students of Villa Cresta Elementary School have dedicated the week of April 8 through April 14 as "Miss Elizabeth Yoder Appreciation Week." Over 500 members of the community, including many former students and coworkers, will be joining the school in their tribute to Miss Yoder.

I wish to commend Miss Yoder for a lifetime of concern and commitment to improving our community. She is an extraordinary individual, a truly great educator, humanitarian, and American citizen, and should serve as an inspiration to all of us.●

U.S. POLICY IN EL SALVADOR

HON. ROBERT J. LAGOMARSINO

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 5, 1984

● Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Speaker, a recent commentary in the Washington Times by Smith Hempstone describes the difficulties the United States faces with its policy in El Salvador and that there are no quick, easy solutions. He calls for patience and constancy, and it is important that we all remember that U.S. interests will not be served by ignoring El Salvador and hoping it will go away.

GET SET FOR THE LONG HAUL

(By Smith Hempstone)

Despite electoral confusion, bureaucratic mismanagement, sporadic guerrilla activity and a nationwide blackout caused by terrorist sabotage, more than 1 million Salvadorans trooped to the polls Sunday in that Central American republic's first presidential election since 1977.

The lessons of the balloting are:

The mass of the people reject the authoritarian leftism of the Nicaraguan-supported terrorists.

The mass of the people—the roughly 63 percent of those who voted either for Christian Democrat Napolean Duarte or Francisco Jose Guerrero of the National Conciliation Party—prefer a moderately-leftist-to-moderately-conservative approach to El Salvador's problems.

A significant minority of the people—perhaps 30 percent—support the tough, ultraconservative policies of Roberto d'Aubuisson of the Nationalist Republican Alliance (ARENA).

Since neither Señor Duarte nor Señor d'Aubuisson obtained an absolute majority in the first round of voting, a runoff will be necessary toward the end of April.

While the turnout was not as large as the 80 percent (1.5 million) of the electorate that voted in the parliamentary elections of 1982, it was, under the circumstances, impressive. Clearly it was good enough to warrant congressional passage of the $62 million in emergency military aid President Ronald Reagan is requesting to keep the Salvadoran army fighting through this spring and summer.

That the issue, the ultimate outcome of the struggle, remains in doubt is hardly surprising. It can be argued that El Salvador is the worst place in Latin America to take on a Marxist insurgency. With nearly 5 million people jammed into a nation the size of Massachusetts, El Salvador has the second-largest population in Central America packed into the smallest continental republic in the Western Hemisphere. There are, as psychologists might say, simply too many rats in the box.

El Salvador has suffered terribly in four years of fighting. At least 50,000 people have lost their lives. American officials estimate the war damage sustained as at least $825 million. The guerrillas control perhaps 20 percent of the country by day, and more after sundown. The insurgents frequently appear to be better led, better organized, and more dedicated than the government forces.

Nevertheless, the war is far from lost and there is no reason to allow the guerrillas to shoot their way into the government without undergoing the bothersome formality of participating in an election. Indeed, it would be madness to bring the rebels into the government, if only because theirs is a revolutionary movement pledged to destroy El Salvador's social and political fabric, not to reform it.

The last thing the communist-supported guerrillas want is a viable democratic government and an equitable social dispensation: Were these to exist, their movement would collapse. Like the Nicaraguan Sandinistas and the Cubans who support them, they want power, not justice.

As in most conflicts of this nature, a purely military solution is impossible. While ultimately the insurgents must be defeated in the field, they must first be discredited and isolated from the people, the "water" in which the guerrilla "fish" swim.

This can only be achieved through the introduction of a strong political component into the anti-terrorist struggle: amnesty without preconditions for guerrillas willing to lay down their arms, effective (i.e., gradual) land reform and strengthened democratic institutions. This means purging the army of incompetent and corrupt officers, and curbing the activities of the right-wing death squads.

We Americans prefer the quick fix to our problems, foreign and domestic. But no such instant solution is possible in El Salvador. That republic's problems were not created overnight and they will not yield to facile remedies. It will cost hundreds of millions of dollars to buy the years necessary to defeat the insurgents.

But the cost will be lower—and victory possible—if and when the United States makes it clear to Central America and the world that America is in El Salvador for the long haul, that we intend to win, that there will be no Kissingerian "decent interval" before an abandoned ally is allowed to succumb to a power that has no legitimacy, to the persuasion that grows out of the barrel of a gun.

Both the reform-minded Señor Duarte and the hard-nosed Señor d'Aubuisson, no matter who gains the presidency, have roles to play in such a scenario. While much divides them, they are united in their opposition to the leftist guerrillas. What is needed is a common front between their forces until the war is won.●

WEIRTON STEEL

HON. ALAN B. MOLLOHAN

OF WEST VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 5, 1984

● Mr. MOLLOHAN. Mr. Speaker, I wish to bring to the attention of the House, a significant accomplishment, attained not by any single man or woman, but by a team of workers and a proud old steel-making blast furnace that has produced a record amount of steel in my home district in West Virginia.

Recently, Weirton Steel closed down its old No. 1 blast furnace for an extensive rehabilitation program, but not before the furnace had produced more than 5,245,000 tons of iron. That outpouring of productivity was the result of a concerted campaign to break the record for a Weirton Steel blast furnace which stood at 4,869,000 tons.

Mr. Speaker, this accomplishment is significant for several reasons. As many in this Chamber are aware, Weirton Steel recently became the largest employee-owned industry in America through an employee stock ownership plan (ESOP). The workers at Weirton have, at a time when our steel industry in America is suffering, taken up the challenge of making their mill a model of success.

The fact that they are closing down the No. 1 record-setting blast furnace at Weirton for extensive rehabilitation is significant because it shows the importance of rebuilding our industry for the future, and that reinvestment is possible for the steel industry.

The fact that these same workers dedicated their efforts to break production records is significant because it demonstrates that they have the capacity for hard work to attain the worthy goals of the ESOP undertaking.

And, finally, this accomplishment is significant because it demonstrates to America that the work ethic that made this country great still exists.

Mr. Speaker, that proud mill of Weirton Steel stands a stone's throw away from where the first iron furnace west of the Allegheny Mountains once produced cannon balls for the War of 1812. The work of the people of Weirton continues a long tradition of dedication and hard toil.

To the men and women of Weirton steel, I offer a hearty well done. To the men and women of America, I say take heed of Weirton's accomplishments because they are blazing a new trail of prosperity for the steel industry.●

HON. DON RITTER

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 5, 1984

● Mr. RITTER. Mr. Speaker, I have just been informed that Estonian zoologist and political prisoner Mart Niklus continues to be mistreated and physically abused while serving his term in the Soviet gulag.

On March 26, Mrs. Elfriede Niklus, Mart Niklus' mother, was granted permission to visit with her son for 2 hours at the infamous Chistopol prison on the provision that the meeting be conducted in Russian. Mrs. Niklus, who is barely conversant in the language of Estonia's Soviet rulers agreed to these conditions. When Mr. Niklus was brought to the meeting area and informed that he would be required to speak with his mother in a foreign language, he rejected the conditions and the meeting, for which he was removed from the room and beaten by prison guards within hearing distance of Mrs. Niklus. In the brief moments that she was able to see her son, Mrs. Niklus was shocked by his appearance. She describes him as being dangerously underweight, his prison garb ragged and dirty. Mr. Niklus' face was badly swollen, apparently from the effects of a recent hunger strike.

Mart Niklus was first imprisoned from 1958 to 1966 for having sent to the West factual photographs depicting conditions in Soviet-occupied Estonia. His latest sentence, 10 years labor camp and 5 years internal exile, dates from 1981, and was based primarily on his efforts, along with several other Baltic human rights activists to publicize and seek renunciation of the notorious Molotov-Ribbentrop Pact, whereby the independent Baltic nations of Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania were arbitrarily partitioned by Hitler and Stalin on the eve of World War II. In July of last year, he was transferred to Chistopol prison, that particularly grueling facility for "especially dangerous state criminals."

Mr. Speaker, in March 1981, the world was shocked to learn that Mart Niklus' countryman and fellow human rights activist Dr. Yuri Kukk died during a hunger strike following his conviction on trumped-up "slander" charges. I trust that the Soviet Government would not wish to see such a tragedy repeated. In 1982, House Concurrent Resolution 218 called upon the Soviet Government to honor its commitments under the Helsinki Accords by allowing Mart Niklus to emigrate to Sweden to join one of his relatives in Sweden. I call upon the Soviet Government to heed this humanitarian plea, and thereby divest itself of the opprobrium that it has acquired in its treatment of political prisoner Mart Niklus.●

THE 1983 CONTRIBUTIONS TO THE UNITED NATIONS FUND FOR DRUG ABUSE CONTROL

HON. BENJAMIN A. GILMAN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 5, 1984

● Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Speaker, the global epidemic of narcotics trafficking and drug abuse have made it essential that all nations of the world join together in an all out assault on this pervasive and debilitating plague that is growing by leaps and bounds, adversely affecting citizens throughout the world.

Hardly a day goes by that we do not receive reports of increased seizures by the planeload and by the boatload of heroin, cocaine, marijuana, PCP, and other dangerous drugs and hardly a day goes by that hospital emergency rooms fail to report individuals succumbing to drug overdose. Just 2 weeks ago, the international community learned of the record-breaking seizure by Colombian drug law enforcement authorities who confiscated 13.8 tons of cocaine—a street value of approximately $1.2 billion. This seizure represents approximately 25 percent of the estimated 50 tons of cocaine consumed in the United States last year.

While the drug growers and traffickers have developed sophisticated techniques to cultivate, process, and market illicit narcotics and have the most modern boats, planes, radar, and other equipment to conduct their clandestine operations, nations of the international community have failed to recognize the need to pool their resources, funds, personnel and equipment to effectively combat the international drug syndicates and have failed to contribute substantially to the United Nations Fund for Drug Abuse Control (UNFDAC). All of this comes at a time when narcotics trafficking and drug abuse have reached epidemic proportions throughout the world and when there is a growing connection among international terrorists, drug growers and drug traffickers who symbiotically exchange protection, guns, and drugs.

UNFDAC has been instrumental in calling attention to the needs of the world community in fighting the tragic scourge of drug abuse. The U.N. Drug Fund's Executive Director, Dr. Guiseppe di Gennaro, has worked diligently to encourage nations to contribute to this international fund that is used to assist nations in their "war" on drugs.

Under the leadership of CHARLIE RANGEL, the House Select Committee on Narcotics Abuse and Control, of which I am the ranking member, met with Dr. Di Gennaro as part of our select committee's recent visit to the drug producing nations of Southeast and Southwest Asia to discuss the need for greater participation by nations of the international community in contributing to the U.N. Drug Fund.

The United States has been critical of the low level of contributions to UNFDAC, I find it distressing to inform my colleagues that last year only 28 nations, or less than 18 percent of the 157 member nations comprising the United Nations, contributed or pledged a meager $3,710,259; private contributions amounted to only $255,953 or a grand total of $3,966,212 for a global effort to combat drug trafficking and drug abuse. This represents a revenue decline of nearly 45 percent, compared to the 42 nations or 27 percent of the members of the United Nations that contributed $6.7 million for 1982, which, with private contributions of $582,000, amounted to a grand total of slightly more than $7.3 million.

Once again, only a handful of nations have contributed or pledged more than $100,000 to the U.N. Drug Fund: Australia, Canada, France, Federal Republic of Germany, Italy, Japan, Norway, Sweden, the United Kingdom, and the United States. Some nations that have benefited the most from certain projects undertaken by UNFDAC have failed to contribute a single penny to the U.N. Drug Fund, and other nations have contributed only a few dollars to that organization. At the U.N. Conference for Development Activities, which was held November 8–9, 1983, 23 nations pledged $3.4 million to the U.N. Drug Fund for 1984.

At a time when international drug syndicates are reaping hundreds of billions of untaxed dollars and whose clandestine operations are undermining the political, economic, and social institutions of the international community, the few million dollars contributed by the nations of the international community to UNFDAC has a ripple effect like a drop in the ocean. Colombia's drug law enforcement authorities seized nearly 14 tons of cocaine worth more than $1 billion. To counter this tidal wave of drugs that is infecting citizens throughout the world, nations of the international community annually scrape together a meager $5 million to $7 million to conduct a "global war" on drug trafficking and substance abuse—hardly enough to purchase a single high-speed coastal patrol boat.

Mr. Speaker, on the brighter side of UNFDAC's financial ledger, the Government of Italy recently contributed not only $188,679 to the U.N. Drug Fund but also, and more significantly, it contributed nearly $41 million to UNFDAC to be spent over 5 years on a special project in the coca-producing Andean region of Peru, Bolivia, and Colombia. In this regard, the Government of Italy and UNFDAC's Executive Director Dr. di Gennaro are to be commended for their dedicated efforts to combat narcotics trafficking. And for the first time since the U.N. Drug Fund was established in 1971, Panama and Zaire contributed to UNFDAC. We hope that Panama and Zaire will continue to annually contribute to the U.N. Drug Fund.

Mr. Speaker, in an effort to share with my colleagues the level of contributions to UNFDAC, I am inserting at this point in the RECORD the following 3 documents: A status report of cash contributions pledged or received by the U.N. Drug Fund as of October 31, 1983, a list of pledges announced for 1984 at the Conference for Development Activities, which was held on November 8–9, 1983, and a table entitled "UNFDAC Expenditures: 1972–83," which indicates the amount that the UNFDAC has expended in 13 nations and I urge my colleagues to continue to support the work of this worthy global effort.

THE WEST MISSES ITS CALLING IN LEBANON

HON. JOHN EDWARD PORTER

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 5, 1984

● Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, all too often analyses of the situation in Lebanon consider only the shifts and swings of the day—which of the warring factions has gained the upperhand or which of the superpowers, the United States or the Soviet Union through Syria, has failed in its Middle Eastern policy. However, there are larger questions that must be addressed, and Mr. Charles Malik considers the more fundamental questions of basic freedoms in his article which appears below.

I agree with Mr. Malik's insightful analysis that the West's fundamental precepts—faith in freedom, dignity of person, respect for mind, and recognition of the transcendent—will, in the long run, overcome the East's cultural advantage with Middle Eastern countries.

Mr. Malik's article follows:

THE WEST MISSES ITS CALL IN LEBANON

(By Charles Malik)

We witness today a fateful confrontation between East and West in the Middle East. The West is wherever the Greco-Roman-Judeo-Christian tradition has taken hold, the East wherever it has not.

Eastern values are ascending in the Middle East and Western values declining. The distinctive Western values (freedom, openness, universalism, reason, unbrokenness of tradition) are despised and denounced. In Lebanon the balance between East and West, as far as ground-fighting forces are concerned, is wholly unequal. How can the Western-oriented elements in Lebanon, with the flimsy and halting assistance they have been receiving from the West, and with Israel now neutralized, long withstand the onslaught of the East represented by the Syrians, Iranians, Libyans, Palestinians and mercenaries recruited from Asia and Africa in the name of religion, and behind them and with them all the Soviets and anti-Western native elements? The West is retreating, the East advancing.

Everybody who visited Lebanon even once remembers it as a land of freedom. The intellectual and social climate has been free and the diverse religious communities have been free. Today the forces threatening freedom are closing in on Lebanon from every quarter, and the word "freedom" is hardly ever mentioned in official pronouncements and serious essays, in Lebanon and elsewhere, as having anything to do with the agony of this land. It is all a matter of demography and sharing of power and wealth, even if freedom should thereby perish. The assassination of Malcolm Kerr, president of the American University of Beirut, is more than a political act: It bespeaks rejection of freedom of thought and learning.

Relative to the Soviet Union, the U.S. suffers from a fundamental built-in handicap in its relations with the Middle East. There is cultural continuity between the Soviets and the realms immediately beyond their borders. The Slavs have been interacting with the world of Islam in war and peace for centuries; indeed the Soviet Union incorporates into its state some 40 million to 50 million Moslems. America enjoys no such cultural continuity. America, and indeed the West in general, has nothing comparable with the phenomenon of Geidar Aliyev, the Soviet central committee member who has focused his attention on the Middle East and visited Damascus. He is of Shiite background, hailing from a Moslem republic of the Soviet Union; both of his names are Arabic.

The Soviet Union's cultural continuity with the Middle East enables it with the ready aid of its military might, to ward off a spilling over of the Iranian revolution northward and eastward, and to direct it instead westward and southward. Mr. Aliyev again! On the side of the West, its cultural discontinuity with the Middle East makes it unable to prevent the tide of this revolution to overflow into the Gulf and the rest of west Asia and north Africa. It can only use force to that end; it cannot use ideas. And it must never be forgotten that under special conditions Marxism can quite happily combine with radical religious phenomena (fanaticism in Iran and liberation theology in Latin America).

How may this inherent handicap be overcome? Not by breeding "Orientalists"; not by giving "crash courses" to diplomats; not by enlisting "specialists"; not by handing out money and machines; not by appeasing the wrathful; not by placating terrorism; not by buying agent rulers, and certainly not by wishful thinking. No "instant" device can do. You are dealing here with history, and history cannot be devised; it can only be lived through.

The handicap can be overcome only by facing it squarely and at the same time realizing that there are universal values that overleap every handicap and obliterate every boundary. The Soviet Union may through cultural continuity have an advantage over the West in relation to the Middle East, but the West has a far greater advantage: faith in freedom, dignity of the person, respect for mind, recognition of the transcendent—all embodied in existing laws and institutions. From these well-springs the West can speak to every person everywhere.

The handicap can be overcome only by conviction and determination of will. Conviction means that you know you have something of supreme value that others do not have, and will means that you are prepared to fight under its banner. When have great civilizations survived and succeeded except when they had faith in themselves; when have they perished except when they lost that faith and their will to overcome?

The greatest single geopolitical fact in the world today is not the nuclear threat but the fact that Americans do not want to fight, and the world knows this and makes its calculations accordingly. Grenada is not a serious exception.

The supreme weapon of the West is freedom. It has never properly articulated and proclaimed this weapon to the peoples throughout the world who are not free. And the apologists keep on droning: "We are not the policemen of the world; people have the right to their own culture even if that were salvery." The impression gained is that faith in the ultimacy and power of freedom has atrophied in the West; freedom is considered inferior to economic, social and material values.

A civilization constituted by Homer, Plato and Aristotle, by the Old and the New Testaments, by Cicero and Augustine, by Shakespeare and Gothe, by Newton and Einstein, by Pushkin and Dostoevski, and by the joy and zest and adventure and freedom of the great American experience, and all that these names concretely mean—can such a civilization lack supreme values for its conviction and burning fire for its will? Who else has anything comparable with this incomparable heritage? America and the West underestimate their immense potential.

For months now, the world has been focusing on Lebanon as a problem. The problem is not Lebanon or the importance of Lebanon. The problem is the West. Indeed, the importance of Lebanon is precisely that it raises the problem of the West. Lebanon would never have been a problem if the West itself were not the problem. And the West is not only the problem but also the solution. That is its singular greatness. And the solution is to be true to the deepest value of the West: the primacy of the spirit and the feedom of the soul.●

EL SALVADOR AND GARY McGOVERN

HON. ROBERT J. LAGOMARSINO

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 5, 1984

● Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Speaker, The Presidential campaign being waged by GARY HART raises a number of questions about his views of U.S. foreign policy and U.S. security interests. These questions require thoughtful, considered answers. Columnist Patrick Buchanan discusses the implications of these issues in a recent commentary in the Washington Times. I believe my colleagues should give their attention to these questions as well.

EL SALVADOR AND GARY MCGOVERN

(By Patrick Buchanan)

On Sunday, 30 young men in El Salvador, army and militia, were killed in action protecting their countrymen, as 70 percent of those eligible went to the polls. It was the second moving manifestation of faith in democracy in two years.

In the United States, roughly half those eligible bother to vote. If we knew some of us would be ambushed and executed along the way, how many would make the trip?

Whether the ultimate victor is the democratic socialist Jose Napoleon Duarte, or the conservative-nationalist Roberto d'Aubuisson, the people of El Salvador have made a simple, eloquent statement: We wish to choose our own leaders; we do not want a regime imposed upon us by the terror and violence of those who attempted to disrupt these elections.

What El Salvador asks of the United States, now, is a modest request: That we, the richest and most powerful of democracies, provide them with the military means to protect the embryonic democratic institutions in which they have manifested their faith. If that military aid is cut off, says Mr. Duarte, "The country will not survive more than a year . . . the communists will take over."

On Capitol Hill, however, the Democratic Party is maneuvering to eliminate that military aid; failing that, to restrict it to such levels that El Salvador's army, fighting on starvation rations, could not survive. As the indispensable allies of Castroism in Central America are the liberal Democrats in the Senate and House, so Fidel's last best hope of recapturing in Central America what he lost in Grenada lies with the candidacy of Gary Hart.

Defeated in Michigan and Illinois, momentum slipping, Mr. Hart has emerged from the closet as the McGovernite he has always been, deploying the same rhetoric against U.S. involvement in Central America that his leader and mentor used about Vietnam.

"I think our forces ought to come out of Central America," he proclaimed in the Chicago debate, "If we do that, we'll save hundreds of thousands of young American lives."

Again and again in Third World struggles, Mr. Hart declares, the United States has "been on the side of repression and corruption and privilege in these battles and that has inevitably been the losing side."

In a full-page ad, tailored for the old antiwar crowd in New York, Mr. Hart drew the parallel even more exactly. "The policies of the Reagan administration have set the stage for another Vietnam . . . As a first step on the path to peace. I have called for the immediate withdrawal of U.S. combat troops from Central America."

President Reagan termed Vietnam "our finest hour," Mr. Hart states, "while I was working with Robert Kennedy and George McGovern to end this tragic war."

Here, perhaps, a correction is needed. Mr. Hart and Mr. McGovern did not, by voting to terminate American involvement in Vietnam and by cutting off Saigon—as they would cut off San Salvador—"end" that "tragic war." They helped mightily to usher in a communist military victory that triggered the greatest human rights holocaust since the fall of China. Thousands of our allies were executed; tens of thousands put into labor camps that became death camps; hundreds of thousands perished as boat people in the South China Sea. In Cambodia, between 1 million and 3 million died in the first years of peace.

Does Mr. Hart consider that an acceptable, indeed, a preferable "peace" in Central America?

If the United States and Ronald Reagan were on the wrong side in Southeast Asia, whose side was Gary Hart on? Uncle Ho's or Pol Pot's?

If the 55,000 Americans whose names grace the black granite walls of the Vietnam Veterans Memorial died fighting "on the side of oppression and corruption and privilege," what, exactly, was that "side" Gary Hart supported fighting for?

What is taking place in El Salvador and across Central America is, in part, a civil war. But, to state, as Mr. Hart does repeatedly, that the enemy in Central America is not communism but poverty, is as inane and absurd as to argue that the Spanish Civil War was fought over the minimum wage.

The battle for Central America is the spearpoint of the Soviet invasion of the Western Hemisphere—mounted from its Cuban base and Nicaraguan beachhead—having as its strategic objective the severing of the continents of North and South America through establishment of half a dozen revolutionary regimes, the military elimination of which would require an American invasion force of a million men.

Strategic considerations aside, what sort of elitism and racism is it that contends the United States should go to war with the Soviet Union to keep 2 million West Berliners out of the grip of Erich Honecker, but not even send El Salvador the weapons it requires to keep 5 million people out of the grip of Fidel Castro?

Mr. Castro ought to take another look at Gary Hart's "new ideas;" I think he'll like them.●

SALUTE TO NORTH CAROLINA'S NATIONAL GUARD

HON. JAMES G. MARTIN

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 5, 1984

● Mr. MARTIN of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I bring to the attention of the Congress an award for special achievement that on March 31 has been presented to the North Carolina National Guard. The Secretary of the Army, John O. Marsh, on behalf of the Army Aviation Association of America, has awarded the Reserve Component Aviation Unit of the Year Award to Attack Company D of the 28th Aviation Battalion.

This very prestigious citation was presented to this unit of the North Carolina Army National Guard, operating out of Raleigh-Durham Airport and Salisbury-Rowan County Airport, for special training in helicopter tactics, including low-level night flight operations. It is noteworthy that 31 of their 48 helicopter aircraft and over 90 percent of their 61 eligible pilots have been qualified successfully for this technically difficult training mission.

For outstanding achievement and recognition in the service of our country, we salute the officers and all personnel of Attack Company D.●

MORE ON BANKRUPTCY

HON. PETER W. RODINO, JR.

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 5, 1984

● Mr. RODINO. Mr. Speaker, I rise to share with my colleagues an editorial which appeared in today's edition of the Wall Street Journal. I also wish to draw your attention to a New York Times editorial appearing on March 28, 1984. You will note their similarity.

Two leading newspapers of our Nation—one liberal, one conservative—united in their condemnation of the results of our congressional bankruptcy legislative efforts.

And they are both right. The history of the past few years in this area of the law is disgraceful.

How did it happen? How did Congress let itself get to this point? The only answer is that all the special interests were so interested in only their own special desires that they all forgot and did not care about the central issue, which is what happens if the bankruptcy system fails. Someone recently compared it to passengers on an airplane all fighting over who gets to sit on the aisle while the airplane itself is on its final dive into the ground because there is no one making sure it was going to keep flying. If each group had been willing to spend some of its effort in an attempt to pass a constitutional system and then tried to obtain the changes they felt they needed, this process would have been more orderly and, ultimately, the Congress would have dealt with each of the many issues on its merits. Alas, it was not to be.

[From the Wall Street Journal, Apr. 5, 1984]

SYSTEM IN BANKRUPTCY

Two years ago, the Supreme Court put Congress on notice that our system of bankruptcy courts was unconstitutional and needed legislative reform. The deadline for reconstituting the courts was to be this March 31. Well, the bell tolled last week and Congress had produced no solution, except to give itself a 30-day extension. This anticlimax is what we have come to expect of modern-day congressional behavior.

The 1978 bankruptcy-law reform created a corps of bankruptcy judges appointed by the president for 14-year terms. In 1982, the Supreme Court said judges with so much authority needed the same kind of judicial independence that regular federal judges enjoy. This independence requires job protections such as lifetime tenure and a secure salary. Congress was supposed to fix things up.

So what happened? First, the regular federal judges said bankruptcy judges shouldn't have their position improved. The federal judges worried mightily about diluting the statute of the judiciary. They feared that bankruptcy judges covering just one area of the law would be vulnerable to improper control by special interests and the specialist bar. The arguments were not very persuasive. But the House passed a bill keeping the bankruptcy judges in their inferior state and presenting almost the same constitutional problems that miffed the Supreme Court the last time around.

Next, various special interests climbed aboard the legislative train. The consumer-credit industry wanted the bill to create terms more favorable to it. So did shopping-center owners. So did farmers with investments in bankrupt grain elevators. The congressmen managed to accommodate all of them. These special interests were not vicious insects crawling over the body of a clean piece of legislation. Existing bankruptcy law is already vastly complicated. What's more, everyone recognizes that the 1978 bankruptcy-law revision was systematically pro-debtor. It is no surprise that the other side should begin campaigning to get some of its own back.

But when you believe in "fine-tuned" legislation to provide exact justice to each different segment of society, you are letting yourself in for constant trench warfare, as was evident last week when the congressmen debating the bankruptcy bill tried to accommodate the interests of labor.

The Supreme Court recently affirmed that a financially troubled company may abrogate its labor contract if the move is in the best overall interest of all the parties involved. The court also said that a company filing for bankruptcy may make this move before a court has given its approval. The decision sent labor into the legislative arena, and on this one there was total deadlock.

The House passed a bill including a pro-labor reversal of the Supreme Court decision. The Senate devised a more mixed version: It required a court to approve a business's labor-contract cancellations in advance, but it kept the standards a business had to meet in these cases more like the conditions a company must fulfill to cancel other types of debts. Crucial parts of labor and business alike balked. The deal fell apart. The deadline was missed.

You can't shed many tears for the special-interest aid in this collapsed legislation. You can note that Congress's insult to the bankruptcy judges didn't become law. But it is distressing to realize that the legislation likely to emerge from next month's wheeling and dealing will doubtless be not better than what we almost got this time.

[From the New York Times, Mar. 28, 1984]

BANKRUPT ON BANKRUPTCY

For two years Congress has had the simple but important task of establishing efficient, constitutionally sound bankruptcy courts. Both political parties are failing that assignment, shabbily surrendering to special interests led by unions and the consumer credit industry.

The job was simple because no massive new bankruptcy code was needed. All Congress had to do was to respond to a Supreme Court decision that struck down one disturbing feature of the bankruptcy reform law of 1978.

It was especially important to complete the task at a time of mounting financial failures. The stronger the bankruptcy system the more effective the rescue of foundering firms and individuals, and the fairer the distribution of debts to creditors.

Instead, Congress is belatedly rushing to create an awkward, two-tiered Federal judicial structure that will prolong litigation and increase court costs.

The 1978 reform was worthwhile but flawed. It created a special bankruptcy court with vast powers to settle all legal problems of a failing business or individual in one tribunal. But bankruptcy judges were denied the guarantees of independence that the Constitution requires for Federal judges—lifetime tenure during good behavior, secuirty from salary cuts. To let judges with limited security wield such far-reaching authority was unconstitutional, the Supreme Court said.

Last year the House Judiciary Committee responded with a clean proposal giving bankruptcy jurists life tenure and secure pay, somewhat lower than that of other Federal judges. Then the consumer credit industry persuaded the Senate to add provisions that would make it harder for installment debtors to gain forgiveness. Then farmers obtained new rules for grain elevator failures. Then shopping center owners got new rules for dealing with failed tenants.

Now the House has hung organized labor's plum upon the Christmas tree. In a floor amendment, with no hearings and little debate, it voted to change law as interpreted only last month by the Supreme Court so that courts would now be forbidden to abrogate labor contracts with companies seeking to reorganize in order to avert formal bankruptcy.

To complete the mischief, the House joined the Senate in sabotaging the original assignment—streamlining the court structure. In this it was egged on by the Federal judiciary, which fears that 227 new lifetime judges will dilute the prestige of those already on the bench. The pending bills would staff bankruptcy courts with untenured judges, whose most important decisions would therefore have to be completely reviewed by Federal district judges.

In the effort to resolve differences between equally disgraceful Senate and House bills, the only question now is whether to set limits on the provisions for labor, installment creditors and other special pleaders. The citizen's best hope is for no law at all, a true confession of Congress's insolvency.●

USIA SHOULD HEED WRITER'S ADVICE

HON. PAUL SIMON

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 5, 1984

● Mr. SIMON. Mr. Speaker, in the St. Louis Post-Dispatch I saw a reprint of an article that appeared originally in the New York Times written by Sally G. Greenway about the Voice of America and what we are doing.

My friends at the USIA would be well advised to tone down the shrillness of their message.

What Sally Greenway writes, we should all listen to.

AMERICA SPEAKS WITH A SHRILL VOICE

(By Sally G. Greenway)

The large Voice of America transmitting station on the island of Rhodes, Greece, is assisted these days by excellent satellite relay, and it renders its broadcasts clear and strong. This is unfortunate, for in the last three years the content of its English-language broadcasts has become so blatantly self-serving of Reagan administration policies that in Greece it is no more credible—and perhaps a little less so—than Radio Moscow. The major difference between the two is that Radio Moscow prefers symphonic music while the Voice of America promotes bubble-gum music.

As a United States citizen living abroad, I assume that these English-language news and features broadcasts are aimed primarily at me and others like me and, secondarily, at those foreigners who incidentally happen to understand English. for the past five years, I have awakened to a Voice of America broadcast, and, for the past three years, in 1983 particularly, it has unwittingly provided just the proper seasoning of black humor with my morning tea and honey.

All Greeks do not, however, possess the ironic faculty, and this winter the Greek government announced that it plans to "re-evaluate the status and operations of the VOA and U.S. military broadcasts in Greece." Other socialist governments, especially those in sensitive countries of southern Europe, may well follow suit, cutting back, if not cutting out.

In the five years since I made its daily acquaintance, the Voice of America has degenerated from an innocuous, often entertaining mix of news and varied features to an organ for right-wing tirades.

Only Israel and Turkey seem to remain exempt from its skewed criticism—a particularly unfortunate bias in this part of the world. One recent broadcast, exquisitely timed to appeal to Greek sensitivities, was a half-hour paean of unqualified praise for the Turkish government. Such praise may indeed coincide with the views of the editors at the Voice, but whatever made them choose to broadcast it over the Greek airwaves at the moment when the Turkish Cypriots declared their part of Cyprus to be an independent state? Surely it was clear even in Washington that that was a low point of Greek-Turkish relations.

This type of thoughtlessness—this disregard for audience concerns—would be unthinkable in commercial broadcasting. It is also ultimately self-defeating. Yet it has become commonplace on the voice of America.

Virtually no broadcast escape the ideological coloring—the exaggerations and other distortions—of the United States Information Agency. Is it conceivable, even to relatively uniformed listeners in southern Europe, that the diabolical Soviet military machine systematically immolates Afghan infants for the sheer, animal joy of the sport? And was the Soviet downing of the South Korean airliner truly a disaster equal in magnitude only to the Holocaust? I don't know what most Greeks think of this, but it all passed as "factual" reporting on the Voice of America.

For the sake of us misguided liberal expatriates, the VOA does provide time for the liberal outlook in a singularly inane feature called "Viewpoint." But the people at the USIA have studied their Goebbels. Usually they counterpose some barely articulate functionary from an obscure liberal "think tank" against a well-spoken and well-known conservative from a major university or distinguished corporation. Needless to say the token liberal more often than not is outmaneuvered and outclassed.

On other occasions, the VOA is quite transported by right-wing fervor. That would be fine in small doses: Even the hard right deserves a chance to have its say. The problem is one of proportion—for most European audiences cannot be expected to understand that these long polemics by snide racists and closet John Birchers do not necessarily represent mainstream American opinion.

If the Voice of America's mission is to present a positive image of the United States and its policies to citizens of other countries, it is failing dismally in its task. Charles Z. Wick, the director of the USIA and a personal friend of President Reagan's, has apparently redefined that creditable goal and is transforming VOA programming into transparent propaganda.

This obvious manipulation of a medium that is sponsored by the United States government and subsidized by Americans' taxes is both embarrassing and annoying to those of us who genuinely wish to see America's better qualities represented abroad. Surely, those qualities can stand unsupported by crutches of propaganda and misinformation.●

COALITION FOR PEACEFUL USES OF SPACE

HON. GEORGE E. BROWN, JR.

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 5, 1984

● Mr. BROWN of California. Mr. Speaker, I am deeply concerned about the events of the past week which have taken us one step closer to an all-out arms race in space. The administration released a report on March 31, entitled "U.S. Policy on ASAT Arms Control," as required by Congress before $20 million in antisatellite procurement funds could be released. The report makes it clear that the administration has no intention of seeking negotiations with the Soviet Union on ASAT's. Under another provision passed by Congress, the administration is required to endeavor "in good faith to negotiate a mutual and verifiable ban" on all ASAT's before the weapon can be tested against an object in space.

Also disturbing was the appointment of Air Force Lt. Gen. James A. Abrahamson, formerly associate administrator of NASA for space flight, as the director of the Strategic Defense Initiative (SDI). This appointment is premature in that Congress has not yet approved funds for this enormously expensive program.

In a bipartisan effort to slow the accelerating arms race in space, 19 of my colleagues and I have formed the Coalition for the Peaceful Uses of Space. Noted individuals and organizations are also involved in this effort. The coalition's objectives include the following: Achievement of a mutual U.S.-U.S.S.R. test moratorum of antisatellite (ASAT) weapons and a U.S.-U.S.S.R. negotiated ban on ASATs; achievement of a funding cap on Department of Defense fiscal year 1985 strategic defense programs aimed or based in space; renewed commitment of the United States to the ABM Treaty; and finally a ban of weapons of all kinds from or directed toward space. I urge my colleagues to join me in pursuing these objectives.

For nearly 40 years the nuclear arms race between the superpowers has been waged. This dangerous and wasteful nuclear crusade must come to an end. At no other time in the past 40 years have we had a better opportunity to put a stop to arms proliferation than we do now. The growing nuclear stockpiles in the United States and U.S.S.R. have become redundant because of the overkill factor. Programs to use new technologies for missile defense, such as ASAT's and the Strategic Defense Initiative, are still in the initial phase of development—slowing these programs down now would be much easier than waiting until they are fully operational.

Below is a list of my colleagues who have already joined the effort to keep space free of weapons. I would also urge my colleagues to review the following article.

A FOCUS ON ARMS CONTROL IS MORE REALISTIC

(By Sidney Drell)

President Reagan's call to shift from deterrence based on the threat of nuclear retaliation to reliance on defense against nuclear annihilation is not new. It has been rejected before on technical grounds: We simply do not know how to build such a shield, particularly in view of the relatively simple steps the offense can take to defeat it. During the earlier debates it was also realized that the pursuit of defenses—or ABM systems—can in fact prove harmful to our security since each nation fears the purpose as well as the capability of its opponent's defenses. We may believe that our defenses enhance deterrence by diminishing the threat of a Soviet first strike. The Soviets, however, may see them as evidence of U.S. preparations for a first strike, a first strike that would leave them with a weakened retaliatory force against which our defenses, though imperfect, would be relatively more effective. President Nixon gave this very rationale in explaining his decision not to deploy a nationwide ABM system in 1969 and in negotiating the ABM Treaty of SALT I that is in effect today.

Since then there have been tremendous advances in technology, which include producing directed energy beams of high power that travel as accurate bullets at the speed of light, and more efficient gathering, processing, and transmitting vast quantities of data for the purpose of battle management. The crucial question is whether these technical advances offer new promise of building an effective defensive system, i.e., can we now solve the problems that led us to conclude, the last time around, that an effective defense was impossible?

Is it universally recognized that no single technology offers a prospect of providing an impenetrable shield or anti-ballistic Maginot Line. Therefore the concept of a "defense in depth" has developed—i.e., a defense with several layers based on different technologies. The important first layer of this system would supposedly destroy most of the missiles right after they are launched. Subsequent layers would attack the remaining warheads high above the atmosphere, and the final layer would intercept the few survivors during the last minute or two when they re-enter the atmosphere near their targets.

However, as we look at each layer of this defense, we encounter problems of monumental magnitude. To take one example, consider a space-based system orbiting the earth and designed to attack missiles shortly after launch. The most advanced of these concepts envisages very high-powered lasers and large optical systems which must operate with near perfection. Imagine how many lasers will have to be put in orbit. Remember that each laser station is circling the earth and will be within kill range of Soviet ICBM launch areas only a small percentage of the time. The number comes out between 100 and thousands, depending on how optimistic one is in extrapolating the performance of the laser systems far beyond current technology. Not surprisingly, so extensive a space-based system is very expensive—there have been published cost estimates ranging upward from $500 billion. However, there remains a more serious problem for this or for any space-based system: its extreme vulnerability to direct attack. Most simply, the space stations can be destroyed by cheap space mines placed in nearby orbits and detonated by radio command from ground. Vulnerability is no less serious a problem for the hybrid systems some have proposed with the lasers on ground and large relay mirrors in space.

If space-based systems won't work for the crucial first layer of the defense, let us consider a ground-based one that is small and light enough to be launched into space at the time of attack; i.e., a "pop-up" system. The X-ray laser pumped by a nuclear explosive is a leading candidate for this. Here again we run into a very severe limitation: the lack of time. Against the current Soviet missile threat, such X-ray lasers have only 3-5 minutes in which to do their job. However, X-rays are absorbed by the atmosphere, and so such a defensive system must itself quickly "pop up" to an altitude well above 100 miles in order to be able to shoot at the attacking missiles. This means that the defense has literally only seconds in which to learn of an enemy attack and be launched. Evidently, such a "pop up" system will have to be fully automated, with all decisions as well as operations turned over to the computers. Moreover, the offense can defeat even this possibility of a defense by redesigning its missiles to burn more rapidly in order to deny even these few seconds. To do so, the offense will have to pay only a slight penalty in efficiency, perhaps 10 to 15 percent.

Technologies other than laser beams are even less far along as candidates for ABM systems. Particle-beam technology is the least mature of the directed-energy technology efforts.

The data-handling—or battle management—problem is thought by many to represent the most stressing technological problem, and it is not fully understood at present. Furthermore, a complex advanced technology defense would have to work to almost 100 percent perfection the first time it was used, even though never tested under realistic conditions in the midst of nuclear explosions.

Despite major technical advances in recent years, we do not now know how to build an effective strategic defense. Nor do I see any real prospect of one in the foreseeable future, unless the offenses are tightly constrained technically and greatly reduced numerically. I agree with Dr. Richard DeLauer, undersecretary of defense for research and engineering, who said last November in the New York Times that "With unconstrained proliferation, no defensive system will work."

As we now undertake an intensified R&D effort aimed at altering the U.S.-Soviet strategic relationship in a very fundamental manner, we must carefully assess the policy implications. It is misleading to say that defenses are harmless and both countries should go ahead with them in order to strengthen deterrence. We saw during the last major ABM 15 years ago that it can stimulate an accelerated buildup of offensive forces. That is precisely how we started on our way to MIRVs, designed to overpower potential Soviet ballistic missile defenses by multiplying the number of warheads on each missile. Both the U.S. and the Soviet Union have to be concerned with the intention of an opponent who modernizes and strengthens his offensive missile forces with weapons that are increasingly capable of first strike, at the same time that he pursues defenses. The pressure for a continuing offensive buildup can be seen in the president's March 23, 1983, speech: "As we proceed (with ABMs) we must remain constant in . . . maintaining a solid capability for flexible response." A distrustful adversary could legitimately argue that the U.S. might well be intending now—or perhaps may decide in a future crisis—to strike first and rely on its defense to deal with a crippled retaliatory response by the Soviets.

I see no prospect today of finding a technological fix to our perilous strategic situation with nuclear weapons. The path to a more secure world must be paved, at its start and for a long distance en route, with constructive efforts at understanding and negotiating toward reducing their threat. This makes it all the more important for us to pursue effective arms control with the Soviet Union, while simultaneously maintaining stable and secure deterrent forces. While working toward a long-term goal of making nuclear weapons obsolete, a goal of considerable merit, we must also use a mixture of diplomatic and defense measures to work to ensure that the nuclear weapons are never used. For the present, I believe this calls for reaffirming the basic concepts of the U.S.-Soviet strategic relationship as reflected in the ABM treaty.●

VOICE OF DEMOCRACY SCHOLARSHIP PROGRAM

HON. HERBERT H. BATEMAN

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 5, 1984

● Mr. BATEMAN. Mr. Speaker, it was recently announced that Janine Ames, a young lady from West Point, Va., in my congressional district, had won the Veterans of Foreign Wars 1984 statewide Voice of Democracy Contest. It is with great pride that I submit her speech entitled, "My Role in Upholding the Constitution" for publication in the Congressional RECORD. It gives us all nourishing food for thought.

1983-84 VFW VOICE OF DEMOCRACY SCHOLARSHIP PROGRAM VIRGINIA WINNER, JANINE AMES, WEST POINT, VA.

I won't mention that the title of this speech is my role in upholding the United States Constitution. Most people would turn me off right away at the mention of this one word "constitution". When we think of the constitution, we picture articles and amendments. We think of laws and rights and even loopholes. But what we don't think of is the most important aspect of this document. We don't think of what it actually symbolizes. Exactly what does this piece of paper stand for? What ideals did our forefathers have in mind when they composed these standards for the United States. I believe they were thinking of much more than a set of guidelines for our government. They were illustrating a dream. They were creating a nation where people would command the government instead of the other way around. They were declaring democracy and with that declaration they proclaimed respect and freedom for every individual. The freedom of choice is the essence of our ideals. We choose our own religion, our careers, our leaders, and the moral standards by which we live. We exercise this freedom every single day. But how many of us think of the constitution when we vote or go to work or attend church? Few of us think of the constitution at all, much less our role in upholding it. Of course, our obvious role involves abiding by the laws, voting, and supporting the decisions of our leaders. But to me our most important role is believing in the ideals established by this document,—believing in democracy. The word democracy literally means government by the people, but this word implies much more. It implies liberty, individualism and faith in our system of government. Lately, it seems we have little faith in our country. This makes it all too clear that we have little faith in ourselves. Perhaps we feel inadequate in choosing our leaders. Too often corruption is associated with politics. I admit there have been scandals. There have been times when elected officials have not lived up to our expectations. There have been times when we were ashamed of their actions. What we don't consider is how many times we have been proud of their strength and their moral character. For example, just recently, the Soviet Union cruelly blasted a civilian plane out of the sky, killing 200 innocent people. We were shocked at such a brutal and thoughtless act. But we were proud to say that we would never think of doing that. We have respect for human life. Yes, patriotism was evoked in American hearts, but why does it take such a tragedy to remind us that we are Americans? We remember corruption but not morals or strengths. For this reason we have little trust in our elected officials.

We don't even bother to listen to their political double talk. Perhaps government has become so complicated that only experts can understand. The truth is that many of us don't take the time to try to understand. We get annoyed when the President interrupts prime time television to explain foreign policy or the state of the Union. In our annoyance, we turn him off without even giving him a chance to explain his actions. But you see that is just it, we are free to turn him off. We are free to stand in judgment when we do not even understand the situation. The sad part is, so many of us do just that. This is more than not upholding the constitution, this is slighting it. We have plenty of people exercising their freedom of speech and religion—all of us do. But how many of us uphold our ideals? How many of us have faith in our nation? Our forefathers had faith. It was their belief that has made our system work for over two hundred years. What we need is a restoration of that kind of faith. We all have a personal obligation as Americans to uphold their dream of democracy.●

RON SCHOCK, WINNER OF VFW VOICE OF DEMOCRACY SCHOLARSHIP PROGRAM

HON. DICK CHENEY

OF WYOMING

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 5, 1984

● Mr. CHENEY. Mr. Speaker, for more than 20 years, the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States has administered a Voice of Democracy scholarship program. The contest challenges the intellect of young students across the country who must compose especially noteworthy and patriotic speeches for the consideration of the judges. This year the number of participants exceeded one-quarter million, of which five were selected as national scholarship winners. The winners from each State were brought to Washington, D.C. by the Veterans of Foreign Wars for final judging. Ron Schock, who attends Buffalo High School in Buffalo, Wyo., wrote the winning speech for the State of Wyoming. As Ron's Representative in Congress I take special pride in presenting his speech entitled "My Role in Upholding the Constitution." I would like to urge my colleagues to read Ron's award-winning speech:

The speech follows:

MY ROLE IN UPHOLDING OUR CONSTITUTION

Judges, fellow contestants, and friends.

We are gathered here tonight in a meeting. Now, it's not a meeting of significant historical importance, yet it is important to us. When we think of renowned meetings in history, such assemblies as Camp David and the SALT Talks come into mind. But, let us work our way back. Back to possibly the most important meeting in United States history. The founding of the United States Constitution. This meeting set the extremely important guidelines by which we are living today.

When I decided to accommodate the large task of determining my role in upholding the United States Constitution, I knew I needed a strong, reliable source and what better source to turn to, than the United States Constitution? But, that's only a document, a guideline with laws. What good does that do me? While I didn't look all through the constitution for every applying phrase or amendment, I had to search no further than the Preamble, that one opening sentence that is now, and should remain to be so familiar to all Americans. Our forefathers stated their reasons for the construction of the constitution in the Preamble, and I feel they also outlined my responsibilities as an American for upholding the constitution.

First, let's look at the obligation of forming a more perfect union. This challenge has been called vague and inexplicit. But, this accusation comes from those who are not looking for a way of helping our country, but rather a way to escape this responsibility. To the loyal American, there are numerous actions that will appropriately carry out this request. The most important action to me is that of living for the improvement of America. Too many times citizens raise problems within our country in an attempt to break it apart. Now granted, our country, as all countries, faces trials, but protest groups are not the solution to these problems. They must be solved calmly and openly if any progress is hoped to be made. After all, if we don't keep peace within our country, how can we hope to achieve peace internationally?

I feel it is my responsibility as an American to get others to work for America and not against it.

The second point of importance which I found in the Preamble was that of establishing Justice. Now you may say this was a goal of our forefathers and it has been accomplished. But keeping justice is a never-ending struggle. Justice is the key to the security and prolonged life of America. The key that guides us through life and keeps opportunities open for Americans young and old. Justice can be the best thing to happen to America if used wisely, but if it is used carelessly, it will send us into an incorrigible spin of self destruction.

The final portion of the Preamble that I have chosen to present is the grand task of securing the blessings of Liberty. Though monumental, it certainly is an attainable goal. This task, I feel, is a special one. Like all of the others, the benefits we receive will be only as good as the work we put into them. We as Americans cannot expect to gain without some sacrifice. Our forefathers worked desperately to get the young country on her feet, and now we must work even harder to keep America the land it is and the land it can be.

Of course, I didn't have the time to bring out every point the Preamble makes. I can only hope that you as Americans have been properly motivated towards working for America on your own. If every man, woman, and child would do their part, if everyone would care enough to work for the country, no other threatening force no matter what the magnitude, would be able to cross us. If this were to be achieved, we would be one giant step closer to international peace. Working together for the benefit of America. That's the key. Do your part people, so that America will remain to be the land of the free, the home of the brave, and America . . . the beautiful.●

WHY IS GROUND WATER SPECIAL FOR CHILDREN?

HON. RICHARD L. OTTINGER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 5, 1984

● Mr. OTTINGER. Mr. Speaker, I am including in the RECORD today a most extraordinary statement by the 6-year-old daughter of a member of the staff of the Environment and Energy Institute, Garren Campbell Bird, on a child's perspective on ground water contamination. It shows both how bright Garren is and how extensive is the public understanding of the seriousness of our ground water pollution problems. I thought it would be useful for my colleagues to have a chance to see this fine letter.

WHY IS GROUND WATER SPECIAL FOR CHILDREN?

Children drink from it. People drink from it. Animals drink from it. Ground water is used for irrigation for desert plants.

Chemicals get in ground water so people can't drink from it. People must be careful where they put chemicals so they won't get in ground water.

From GARREN.

COMMENDING CAMILLE A. KUMMER ON HIS RETIREMENT

HON. SILVIO O. CONTE

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 5, 1984

● Mr. CONTE. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to honor Camille A. Kummer of Holyoke, Mass., upon his retirement as general manager of the Appleton Corp., a property management company serving the needs of the elderly across western Massachusetts.

During his nearly 20 years at Appleton and it's parent company, Daniel O'Connell's Sons, Inc., Mr. Kummer has combined the best of both business acumen and community service. Under his direction, these two companies have constructed numerous housing projects for the elderly and handicapped within my district. From Pittsfield to Northampton, I have witnessed Mr. Kummer's efforts on behalf of the elderly and handicapped. And indeed, he deserves wide acclaim as a competent and compassionate businessman who has truly served his constituency.

Without abandoning his profound dedication to the aged and infirmed, Mr. Kummer took a company of two individuals and created one of western Massachusetts' most respected property management concerns. At the same time, he remained deeply committed to many other community activities, serving as his parish council's president and earning the honor of a 4th degree Knight of Columbus. My words of praise, however, pale in comparison to the testimony of the thousands of elderly people for whom has provided comfort and compassion. It is both a pleasure and an honor for me to rise today and commemorate the occasion of his retirement.●

THE EMPLOYEE HEALTH CARE COST REDUCTION ACT OF 1984

HON. WILLIAM E. DANNEMEYER

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 5, 1984

● Mr. DANNEMEYER. Mr. Speaker, while Americans rejoice over the tremendous advances in medical science that have emerged in recent years, advances that have made it possible to treat and often cure disease and conditions that would have been fatal not long ago, a dark cloud is beginning to gather on the horizon. Like the thunderclouds that boil up every spring, this is not the first time this cloud has cast a long shadow.

But it is getting darker and more menacing with every passing day, threatening practically every American family affected by serious illness with the prospect of acute financial deficiency. Many families cannot afford the rapidly rising cost of health insurance and even those who can afford it may find themselves having to come up with thousands of dollars out of pocket in the event of serious illness because their health insurance does not stretch far enough.

That cloud, of course, is the specter of rapidly rising health care and health insurance costs. Last year, for instance, medical costs rose 8.7 percent and physicians fees 6.4 percent while the Consumer Price Index (CPI) only rose 3.2 percent. The year before, it was much the same story; health care costs rose 11.9 percent compared to a 6.1-percent increase in the CPI. In fact, in 16 of the past 20 years health care costs have risen faster than the cost of living generally, putting tremendous pressure of health insurance premiums and those Federal programs—medicare and medicaid in particular—designed to help the elderly and the poor. From their inception in 1965 and 1967 respectively, the combined cost of medicare and medicaid—to the Federal taxpayer—has reached the $92 billion level, which accounts for roughly 2.3 percent of our gross national product (GNP).

Speaking of GNP, it should be noted that health care costs are not only rising faster than other costs, but they are consuming a greater percentage of our gross national product. In 1960 we, as a nation, spent 5.3 percent of our resources on health care. Next year, just 25 short years later, health care costs will account for 11.4 percent of our GNP, meaning that, if this trend continues, one of two things will happen. Either the growth in health care costs will be curtailed by one means or another or we will face the prospect of having to limit the availability of health care services.

Inasmuch as no one wants, or has ever wanted, to ration health care, the real question is—how else are we going to curb the rise in health care costs? The American Medical Association (AMA) is to be commended for its call for a voluntary 1-year freeze on physicians fees but, however meritorious, that alone is not quite enough. Likewise, the new diagnosis-based reimbursement system for medicare and medicaid will give health care providers an incentive to cut costs and the overutilization of services, but it does nothing to give that same incentive to health care beneficiaries. What is needed is a program that will give the prospective patient an incentive not to seek expensive medical diagnosis or treatment for every little headache or toe-ache while, at the same time, providing coverage for those times when medical care is really needed.

Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing a bill that I believe will facilitate just such a program. Basically, what this measure will do is give employees, who are members of a group health insurance plan, an option of choosing coverage with a higher deductible in return for a contribution, made by his employer, to his IRA. The amount his employer would contribute would be equivalent to the premium reduction that his employer would realize from the switch from low-deductible to higher deductible health insurance coverage.

In addition, any financial institution agreeing to handle an IRA into which such contributions would be made would also have to agree to extend a line of credit to the employee, up to the amount of the higher deductible, to cover medical expenses that would otherwise have been covered by the employee's insurance, provided, of course, that a licensed physician certified the validity of those expenses. Thus, even those who are already opting for high-deductible coverage would have some incentive to participate; even though they might receive little or nothing in the way of an employer contribution, they would still gain access to a line of credit for medical emergencies.

In theory, at least, everyone should benefit from implementation of such a proposal. The employee who decided to participate would receive a contribution to his or her IRA and/or a line of credit for medical emergencies that would not otherwise be forthcoming or available. The employer, who would not incur any additional cost in the short run, might realize a reduction in the rate of increase of high-deductible insurance over the longer term. The participating financial institution would get some new business that it might not otherwise obtain.

And, finally, the general public would benefit by virtue of the fact that health insurance premiums and the cost of Government provided health care programs would not go up so fast, which brings us back to the fact that an employee, knowing that he or she may have to pay a relatively small medical bill out of pocket—with high-deductible coverage—will think twice about incurring that bill.

Rather than going to the doctor right away, he or she may take an aspirin or an Alka-Seltzer and see if they help matters. More often than not, nonprescription drugs, time, rest, or some combination of the three will work wonders not the least of which will be the easing of demand for, and subsequently the cost of, professional health services. Likewise, the thought that a loan against one's IRA might be necessary to cover the cost of that discretionary test or X-ray might deter a sick worker from demanding more in the way of health care than is really necessary.

As for how this idea would work in practice, one of the purposes in introducing the Employee Health Care Cost Reduction Act of 1984 at this time is to solicit comments and criticism from affected parties ranging from beneficiary representatives to those in the insurance industry. From them we should be able to get a better idea of how it would work and what kinds of refinements, if any, need to be made. Evidence already exists, however, in the form of a preliminary Rand Corp. report on the relationship between health cost sharing, better known as deductibles, and the demand for medical services, to the effect that "total expenditure per capita * * * rises steadily as coinsurance falls."

More specifically, this interim study, which was published in late 1981, suggests that those with full insurance coverage have a per person health care expenditure level almost 16 percent higher than those who pick up 25 percent of their medical costs and 60 percent higher than those who had what amounted to income related catastrophic health insurance. Based on this evidence, and the obvious need to curb the rise on health care costs, the least we should do is give the concept I have just described a full hearing and a fair trial and that is exactly what the bill I am introducing will permit.

Nothing in it will require any employer or employee to participate but, on the other hand, those who would like to give it a try, would be able to do so. Implementation of this proposal should cost the Federal Government nothing—from a tax standpoint an employer contribution to an IRA would be treated no differently than insurance premiums paid by the employer; both are ordinary deductible business expenses—and there is a very real prospect that Federal taxpayers as well as all other health care consumers would realize substantial cost savings in the future. That possibility alone should recommend its consideration.

Mr. Speaker, so that my colleagues may have a better idea of the specifics of what I am proposing, I ask unanimous consent that a section-by-section summary of the bill be inserted in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks. After looking it over, I hope other Members of this body will see fit to give the Employee Health Care

Cost Reduction Act of 1984 their support.

SECTION-BY-SECTION ANALYSIS OF THE EMPLOYEE HEALTH CARE COST REDUCTION ACT OF 1984

SECTION 1

(a) Title: Employee Health Care Cost Prevention Act of 1984.

(b) Purpose: To reduce medical care overutilization by giving employees enrolled in group health plans an incentive to carry health insurance plans with higher deductibles.

SECTION 2

(a)(1) Authorizes trustees of "eligible individual retirement accounts (IRA's)" to extend credit to employees who agree to participate in such a program.

(2) Defines "a qualified group health insurance plan "as a group health plan offered by an employer which offers a "qualified high deductible option."

(3) Defines "qualified high deductible option" as one which is higher than any other deductible offered and which results in the employer contributing to the employee's IRA a sum equivalent to the difference between the premium on the previous deductible plan and the premium on the higher deductible plan.

(4) Defines "deductible amount" as the total, for each individual covered, of all deductibles contained in the qualified group health insurance plan in question.

(5) Defines "eligible individual retirement account" as one which is set up by the employee for that purpose at a bank, thrift or credit union which, in turn, is willing to extend a line of credit to the employee to cover medical costs incurred by the employee. Those costs must be certified by a physician in order for the line of credit requirement to be triggered.

(6) Limits the amount of credit which the financial institution acting as trustee for the employee's IRA's is obligated to extend to 90% of the balance in the IRA or a sum equivalent to the "deductible" amount whichever is less.

(7) Defines "premium savings amount", which is the amount the employer shall contribute to the employee who elects the "qualified high deductible option", as the difference between, the premium for that option and the premium for a lower deductible option. In cases where more than two deductible options are available to the employee, the "premium savings amount" is defined as the difference between the premiums for the two highest dedictible options so as not to penalize the employee who assumed a greater degree of his/her health care burden in the past by opting for a higher deductible.

(b) Provides that, in cases where any of the funds in the employee's IRA are used to repay a line of credit that has been extended the employee to cover medical costs, those funds shall be considered to be taxable income attributable to the employee.

(c) Makes a number of technical and conforming amendments to existing law necessary to implement the aforementioned provisions.

(d) Makes the provisions of the bill applicable to the 1985 tax year and all subsequent tax years.●

MY ROLE IN UPHOLDING OUR CONSTITUTION

HON. MIKE SYNAR

OF OKLAHOMA

Thursday, April 5, 1984

● Mr. SYNAR. Mr. Speaker, as a Member of Congress, one of my most important duties is to uphold the U.S. Constitution. As lawmakers, my colleagues and I have the opportunity to consider our role in upholding the Constitution daily. Therefore, I thought my colleagues might be interested in the refreshing perspective of another who has given the question of what an individual can do to uphold the ideals of the U.S. Constitution much thought.

A young man from the Second District of Oklahoma contemplated this question recently in a speech he submitted to the Veterans of Foreign Wars annual Voice of Democracy contest. I am pleased to say that Mr. Jeffrey Peevyhouse, a senior at Kinta High School, has been selected as the Oklahoma winner in the 1983-84 VFW Voice of Democracy scholarship program for his speech entitled "My Role in Upholding Our Constitution."

I would like to take this opportunity to enter the text of Mr. Peevyhouse's speech into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. I know my colleagues will be as impressed as I was with this young man's thoughts.

MY ROLE IN UPHOLDING OUR CONSTITUTION

"I regret I have but one life to give for my country." Few people know the name of the famous person who said those famous words. That person had a dream that was shared by many of his countrymen. That man believed in that dream to such an extent that even when faced with, forfeiting that dream or death, he chose death. His dream was of a new country, a free country, that all of the people could have a hand in ruling. The man's name was Nathan Hale. His dream was of a new nation.

The fulfillment of this dream would not come easy. Both sides would suffer dearly in the war that followed. The dream was not only of a new independent country, but also of the freedom to govern themselves and become anything the individual wanted too. That dream of a free country came about on July 4th, 1776. It was the end of the Revolutionary War and the birth of a new nation, the United States of America.

Even before the new government was formed the people began to fear losing their new found rights and privileges. The answer was a statute of laws providing separation of powers of the government and the protection of the public as a whole. The answer was the Constitution.

Few people realize just what the Constitution does. Some people think it is no more than more laws to complicate life. But actually, it simplifies life considerably. For instance, you may go out in public, criticize the government and not worry about disappearing before morning—never to be seen alive again. Nearly ⅞'s of the countries in the world consider speaking against their government, treason and a crime punishable with death. The Constitution allows us to do things the majority of people in other countries only dream of. We have many rights insured by the Constitution. To name just a few there is freedom of the press, freedom of speech, freedom of religion and the right to bear arms.

One of the ways I can support the Constitution and my forefathers' dream, is to take an active role in politics such as running for an office or just voting for the candidate of my choice. Another is to support the law enforcement in the performance of their duty, by reporting crimes, serving as a juror or as a witness. If I support the law enforcement by just being a citizen who stays out of trouble, then I am supporting the Constitution as well.

The Constitution supports my individual rights and my families' as well. No one can legally take those rights away from me unless the Constitution were done away with.

The Constitution is much like the blueprints used by the carpenter. Our forefathers used those blueprints to build, what all Americans know as the United States of America, but what other foreign countries know as a free nation and the most powerful nation on earth. All of my freedoms depend on the Constitution, without it we would be no better off than the ⅞'s of the countries in the world who look at the Americans with a longing to be like us. Our system of government has made us the leader in technology, medicine, education and industry of the world. Everyone can be an ideal citizen by voting, urging others to vote and upholding the law. My forefathers have long since departed but their dream is still very much alive. It is my duty, and everyones', to make sure that dream never dies, for if it does, the American way of life will never be the same again.●

INFLATION WATCH

HON. LEE H. HAMILTON

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 5, 1984

● Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Speaker, I have asked the staff of the Joint Economic Committee to understand an "Inflation Watch" project. In this they will monitor recent key development affecting prices, and review the outlook for inflation.

In the March 26 Wall Street Journal, Alfred Malabre, Jr. points out that although the consumer and producer price indexes both rose less rapidly in February than in January, five signs point to faster inflation ahead:

First. The prices of industrial raw materials have risen sharply since early February. These increases will begin to show up in the more familiar price indexes in about 6 months.

Second. A "boom monitor" developed by Data Resources, Inc., which measures eight facets of the business picture has recently been surging. In the past this monitor has indicated periods of worsening inflation.

Third. Factory utilization is now at 81 percent of capacity, a level at which the inflation rate has accelerated in recent years.

Fourth. The unemployment rate is still high by historical standards, but the ratio of employment to the working age populations is near the all-time high reached in 1979. Some analysts regard this as the most meaningful measure of labor availability.

Fifth. The recent decline in the dollar will provide welcome relief for American exporters and domestic producers of import-competing goods. But it also leads to an increase in the prices of imports, which now amount to almost 11 percent of the goods and services purchased by Americans.

EARLY-WARNING GAUGES SIGNAL PRICE SPEEDUP

The latest signals from such broad measures as the consumer and producer price indexes may suggest that inflation isn't worsening. Both rose somewhat more slowly last month than in January. However, other barometers that show not where prices are but where they probably will be some months hence point to trouble. These gauges indicate that inflation will soon be heating up further.

Most precursors of inflation have been signaling a worsening price spiral for months. But until recently a few still behaved in a fashion suggesting that just possibly inflation might not accelerate and instead would continue at a relatively moderate pace. Of late, however, this hopeful glimmer has faded.

One indicator that has recently turned more worrisome is an index compiled by the Commodity Research Bureau in New York that measures the overall price movement of 13 industrial raw materials. Ranging from tin to burlap to tallow, the materials generally are traded freely and tend therefore to be particularly sensitive to changes in supply-demand pressures. Early last year, the index began to rise steeply, suggesting inflation ahead at a time when consumer and producer prices were about flat. The warning proved accurate. The broad price measures are rising faster now than during most of last year.

Early last December, however, the climb in the raw-materials index came to an abrupt halt. For over two months, it barely budged, giving rise to the hope that perhaps inflation might not accelerate further. But since early February a sharp new climb has begun. The index, which uses the average 1967 reading as a base of 100, recently crossed above the 290 mark. It has jumped some 10 points in a month and reached its highest level since before the last recession. The index tends to foreshadow increases in the broad price measures by six months to a year.

A buildup of inflationary pressure is evident in a wide variety of gauges that reflect the economy's ability to handle rising business activity without strain of the sort that brings production bottlenecks, shortages and eventually larger price increases.

One such measure, dubbed a boom monitor, is produced monthly by Data Resources Inc. of Lexington, Mass. It reflects changes in eight somewhat arcane facets of the business picture. These include, for example, car sales per person of driving age, the inflation-adjusted growth of bank reserves plus currency and the ratio, again adjusted for inflation, of capital spending to the gross national product. The monitor is designed to signal the approach of periods of unsustainable economic growth.

Recently, it has been surging. It remains below the 60-plus readings that in the past have marked the arrival of unsustainable booms. But it is fast nearing such levels. In January, the latest month available, it reached 52.7, the highest reading in four years and more than triple levels prevailing near the pit of the last recession. The January rise, from a December reading of 49.9, also brought the monitor above its average of 50 for the full post-World War II era. In that span, by DRI estimates, there have been seven previous boom periods, all marked by shortages of some sort and worsening inflation. Morever, all were followed by either full-fledged recessions or intervals of sharply reduced economic growth.

Other signs of inflationary pressure are widespread. Sharply on the increase, factory utilization crossed above 80% of capacity last month for the first time since before the last recession. It last moved decisively above the 80% mark in 1977, shortly before consumer prices began to rise at double-digit rates. By no coincidence, recent surveys of corporate purchasing agents show more and more items in short supply. Nearly 70% of these agents also report slower and slower deliveries. In the past, inflation has invariably accelerated in such a situation.

On the labor front, the volume of help-wanted advertising keeps climbing and the percentage of the working-age population not employed keeps dropping. At close to 40%, the rate is within a whisker of its all-time low reached in 1979, the most inflationary year of the post-World War II era. Many analysts regard this statistic, rather than the much publicized unemployment rate, as the most meaningful measure of the reserve of labor. When it is unusually low, as now, this suggests future labor shortages, escalating pay demands and ultimately worsening inflation.

Considerations apart from the various indicators also are worrisome. The big rise in the dollar's international value in the last few years has tended to reduce import prices. But the dollar's climb may well be over. Its value has recently dipped. A sustained drop, which many analysts anticipate, would act to raise import prices. Recent upward revisions of money-supply growth also point to inflation. Experience shows that larger gains in the money supply lead normally to larger price increases. An added price threat is protectionism. Pressure for increased barriers against imports mounts. Such moves, of course, facilitate price increases in protected industries.

If inflation does worsen, how steep will the price climb be? After last year's consumer-price gain of only 3.2%, are double digits likely again? No one knows, but it is sobering to recognize that if the annual rate or rise were to persist at only, say, 7%, this would be sufficient to cut the dollar's buying power in half in a decade.●

VOICE OF DEMOCRACY

HON. THOMAS A. DASCHLE

OF SOUTH DAKOTA

Thursday, April 5, 1984

● Mr. DASCHLE. Mr. Speaker, I wish to commend, Pennie Hein, of Clear Lake, S. Dak., as the South Dakota winner of the VFW "Voice of Democracy" contest. I also wish to commend the VFW for initiating this contest which promotes good citizenship and patriotism in our young people. I hope all my colleagues will read Pennie's speech, entitled, "My Role in Upholding our Constitution."

The article follows:

MY ROLE IN UPHOLDING OUR CONSTITUTION

The late John F. Kennedy once said, "Ask not what your country can do for you, but what you can do for your country." This statement holds true today because there are several things we can do for our country. As a citizen of the United States I feel I should know my role in upholding the constitution.

There are three major roles we can carry out as students. First, to get a good education. Secondly to be involved. And third to obey the laws in the constitution. But before we can carry out these roles we must understand the constitution and know how it came to be.

Our nation's constitution was set up so that each citizen had his or her own rights. But along with these rights also come several responsibilities. The United States is strong only as long as everyone does his part.

It may seem that, as students, we can't really do that much. But we must begin as students and build our way up. Before we can do our part in upholding the constitution we must understand why it was written.

Our constitution was written by our forefathers because they knew what it was like not to have a voice in the government. They wanted a land where everyone was free to do as he wanted. They soon found, however, that certain guidelines were needed and that everyone had to work equally hard to make the country a success. Thus, the constitution was written.

Though our constitution is like a set of rules, everyone has rights and responsibilities. As our nation has progressed we find that keeping our responsibilities may be harder than one thinks.

As a student, probably our first and biggest responsibility is getting a good education. Through an education we can develop and use our talents to keep our government strong. Whether we become farmers or lawyers we play an important role. By getting an education we also learn to set values which will prove to be very important in our futures as citizens. Another advantage of getting a good education is that we become better informed about what we can do to uphold the constitution.

A second responsibility we carry is to become involved. We must not just sit back and watch—we must do activities. One way of being involved is to be active in student organizations which help our communities. Helping our communities in turn helps keep our country and the laws of our country strong. One other way is helping others. We have freedom of speech. We can use this freedom to share our experiences with others so they can learn from our experiences. We must not be afraid to be involved. Someone once said, "This republic was not established by cowards, and cowards will not preserve it."

But our third and probably most important role is observing the laws outlined in the constitution. Law abiding citizens are the strongest foundation our democracy can have. Knowing the laws and living by them is extremely important. Much of the constitution is based on principles and morals, for instance, the moral of not stealing or not to take the life of another human being.

Getting an education, being involved, and observing the laws are just a few of our responsibilities as citizens. We find that the statement by our former president is very true. There are several things our country can do for us, but there are many more things that we, as law abiding citizens, can do to improve our country. Several of these are outlined in the constitution. We must each work hard in carrying out our roles in upholding the constitution.●

INTRODUCTION OF MINIMUM LEGAL DRINKING AGE LEGISLATION

HON. JAMES J. HOWARD

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 5, 1984

● Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, today, I am joining with several of my colleagues to introduce a bill which we believe will be an effective measure in reducing the number of fatalities and injuries on our Nation's highways.

This bill would encourage a national minimum drinking age at a uniform level of 21 nationally by withholding 5 percent of a State's highway apportionment for fiscal year 1986 if that State does not have a 21-year-old drinking age in 1986 and 10 percent of its apportionment in 1987 if the State retains a lower minimum drinking age. Such a measure is necessary to curtail the disproportionate number of deaths and injuries that occur within the age group under 21.

I introduce this bill reluctantly, because I do not relish withholding much needed highway funds. I believe in this regard I speak for my colleagues who have joined with me in introducing this bill. However, the cost to society in terms of death and injury make this measure necessary—indeed, mandatory. And, as currently drafted, the 15 percent total highway funds withheld will be reapportioned to any State that brings its drinking age up to the national limit of 21.

The statistics supporting this legislation are sadly convincing. In 1981, 20 percent of the drivers involved in alcohol-related fatal accidents were under 21 years of age, yet these drivers represented only 8 percent of the licensed drivers and drove only 9 percent of the total vehicle miles. In 1982, a 15-State study found that 45 percent of persons between 16 and 19 involved in a fatal accident were at or above the 0.10-percent BAC level and on weekends that figure rose to 56 percent. An estimated 130,000 teenagers are injured each year in alcohol-related accidents, and every day 14 die and another 360 suffer injuries. Furthermore, teenage drivers kill other people more often than themselves. More than one-half of the persons killed by teenage drivers in 1978, for example, were passengers in their cars or drivers or passengers in other vehicles. A 21-year-old drinking age also has the effect, as columnist Ellen Goodman put it, of raising the lying age to 19 or 20. A study of various States and Canadian provinces that reduced their drinking ages from 21 to 18 undertaken by a research team at the Insurance Institute for Highway Safety found that there were significant increases in fatal crash involvement—particularly in nighttime and single vehicle crashes in which alcohol is most often involved—of drivers under 21 in these areas, compared with adjacent areas that did not reduce their drinking ages. These increases occurred not only among 18- to 20-year-olds, who were directly affected by the law change, but also among 15- to 17-year-olds.

While there is no one cure for alcohol-impaired drivers the steps that can be taken should be taken, and 21 is one measure that is a proven lifesaver. Making it nationwide makes sense because many States with 21 laws border States with lower drinking ages, making it necessary for those under 21 to drive to drink.

Because of the life-saving benefit of this measure, I am hopeful that States without a 21-year-old minimum drinking age will early adopt such a measure.●

TRIBUTE TO GEN. DRAZA MIHAILOVICH

HON. PHILIP M. CRANE

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 5, 1984

● Mr. PHILIP M. CRANE. Mr. Speaker, I am today introducing a bill that seeks to make amends, at least in part, for one of the great historical injustices of World War II.

Many of my colleagues may remember a Gen. Draza Mihailovich of Yugoslavia, one of the foremost freedom fighters in the European resistance movement during World War II. As you may recall, Mihailovich and his Chetnik forces were directly responsible for saving the lives of some 500 American airmen forced down in Axis-controlled Yugoslavia. Despite the fact that he fought against the Nazis, Mihailovich, a victim of Communist propaganda, was executed as a war criminal by Tito's forces following the war.

The United States was in part responsible for the fate of General Mihailovich and the Chetnik forces when it elected to follow the British lead to support Tito. Recent evidence indicates that the decision made by the United States and the British was based on skewed intelligence reports submitted by Cambridge-recruited Soviet spies within the British military.

The bill that I am introducing authorizes the National Commission of American Airmen rescued by General Mihailovich to establish a public monument to honor the general for his role in saving the lives of these U.S. airmen. The commission has agreed to finance the entire construction and maintenance of the monument.

It is only fitting that we honor this hero for his courage and undying support to the Allied cause. I urge you to join me in recognizing the valor of General Mihailovich.

The bill follows:

H.R. —

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the National Committee of American Airmen Rescued by General Mihailovich is authorized to establish a monument on public grounds in the District of Columbia or its environs to honor and recognize General Draza Mihailovich for the role he played in saving the lives of more than 500 United States airmen in Yugoslavia during World War II.

SEC. 2. (a) The Secretary of the Interior, in consultation with the National Committee of American Airmen Rescued by General Mihailovich, shall select with the approval of the Commission of Fine Arts and the National Capital Planning Commission a suitable site on grounds owned by the Federal Government in the District of Columbia or its environs for establishment of the monument referred to in the first section of this Act.

(b) The National Committee of American Airmen Rescued by General Mihailovich shall be responsible for the development of such monument's design and plans, which shall be subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, the Commission of Fine Arts, and the National Capital Planning Commission. If the Secretary of the Interior, the Commission of Fine Arts, or the National Capital Planning Commission fails to approve or make specific objection to such design and plans within ninety days of submission, his or its approval shall be deemed to be given.

(c) Neither the United States nor the District of Columbia shall bear any expense in the establishment of the monument other than expenses incurred in the process of site selection and approval of design and plans.

SEC. 3. The Secretary of the Interior shall permit groundbreaking for construction of the monument only after he determines that sufficient funds are available to complete the monument in accordance with the approved design and plans.

SEC. 4. The authority conferred by this Act shall lapse unless the construction of the monument begins within two years after the date of enactment of this Act.

SEC. 5. The maintenance and care of the monument established under this Act shall be the responsibility of the National Committee of American Airmen Rescued by General Mihailovich.●

SYLVIA PORTER GIVES SOUND ADVICE ON FOREIGN LANGUAGES

HON. PAUL SIMON

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 5, 1984

● Mr. SIMON. Mr. Speaker, Sylvia Porter, one of the most widely circulated columnists in the United States, recently had a column, "Poor Language Skills Threat to U.S. Security."

I am pleased to say the House has passed the legislation that she refers to in her column.

The Senate has yet to act, and I hope that our friends in the other body will soon act on this matter.

I am inserting the Sylvia Porter column in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. I hope my colleagues in both Houses will read what she has to say:

POOR LANGUAGE SKILLS THREAT TO U.S. SECURITY

There are more teachers of English in the Soviet Union than there are students of Russian in the United States.

About 10,000 Japanese conduct business in the United States for their firms. Most speak English. Approximately 900 Americans conduct business in Japan and few speak any Japanese.

In 1980-81, no Ph.Ds were awarded in Arabic, only one in Japanese and six in Chinese in the United States.

Perhaps, right after World War II, when we thought ourselves the policeman of the world, such incompetence in foreign languages was more understandable. Today, our performance in foreign languages is a dangerous problem.

It makes us less competitive in international business. It hampers us in diplomacy and international relations. It threatens our national security. This incompetence makes us appear silly to the rest of the world.

The failure of our educational system to build enrollments in foreign-language courses was among the "most important casualties of a national educational laxity ushered in by the 1960s," says the president of Columbia University, Michael I. Sovern. Every expert on the state of American education echoes his remarks.

Yet the federal government has requested no money to fund one major program that fosters language study at the collegiate and postgraduate levels.

For fiscal 1984, the federal government will spend $4.6 million, and this represents a huge improvement. For this year, the budget request totaled zero.

This year, Congress will vote to reauthorize the Higher Education Act, including Title VI, called International Education and Foreign Language Studies. The House has passed a bill sponsored by Rep. Paul Simon, D-Ill. Simon's bill would establish six new programs to encourage foreign-language training and improve the quality of instruction at all educational levels.

Funds would be directed to model language programs in local school districts, in junior and community colleges and to colleges that enrolled a minimum percentage of students in language courses. The underlying concept: to encourage a language requirement. The bill would establish summer programs for students and their teachers, too.

It would be self-deception were our administration and Congress to ignore this legislation. We must run fast merely to stay in place in our study of other languages. We must appropriate adequate funds to make a difference in how we fare.

Congressional activity coincides with local efforts to strengthen foreign language requirements in elementary and high schools. A 1980 survey found that only eight states required high schools to offer foreign language instruction, and no state had a language requirement for graduation.

Only 15 percent of all high school students now study a foreign language, down from 24 percent in 1965; only 8 percent of U.S. colleges require a second language for admission, a drop from 34 percent in 1966.●

EL SALVADOR'S NEED FOR URGENT SECURITY ASSISTANCE

HON. JACK F. KEMP

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 5, 1984

● Mr. KEMP. Mr. Speaker, I was privileged to be in El Salvador recently as an observer of their first round of elections. I talked with dozens of people, standing in line at various polling places, waiting hours and hours to exercise their precious right of suffrage. I remember one elderly woman in particular, whom I asked why she was voting. She said, "It is my civic duty, my national duty, my responsibility." And then I asked, "Who do you think will win?" And she said, I think democracy will win." The hardships the patient Salvadorans are suffering to bring democracy and freedom to their country can not but touch and affect Americans in a special way.

In a sense, our democratic strength is also our weakness: We have lived with the electoral processes of democratic self-government for so many years now that we hardly understand what it means to live under conditions where that privilege is in imminent danger of being lost.

The Salvadoran people are literally dying to keep their hopes for democracy alive. They are dying because outside military forces dominated by Cuba and its Soviet patron have been inserted in their country in order to prevent El Salvador from enjoying democratic freedom.

The United States is helping, obligated by our own first principles to help, our Salvadoran neighbors in their struggle against tyranny either from the left or right.

But political squabbles notwithstanding, compassion alone should be enough to convince Americans that the Salvadoran Army needs medical and security assistance. And we in the Congress must act immediately to pass the supplemental funding they so urgently need.

Fred Reed in the following column details the deplorable and wretched conditions under which Salvadorans are fighting and dying, in many cases needlessly, because of shortages of medical equipment, trained medical personnel, radios, and small weapons. The security assistance the administration has requested from Congress will help to overcome these tragic shortages which are costing lives. I do not believe that as a humane people we can refuse to provide the modest amounts of assistance the President is seeking for El Salvador. Human rights are a matter of overriding concern, but to use "human rights" as an excuse for turning our back on those suffering violence at the hand of aggressors is worse than callous. It would be a mockery of human rights to blame people struggling for their democratic rights, as if they were at fault for not bringing pressure to bear on their government to grant those rights. The first step has to be terminating the military violence that wracks that country, preventing democratic government from fully achieving its humanitarian effects on the human rights situation. That should not be difficult even for opponents of the President's Central American policy to understand.

SHORTAGES PLAGUE SALVADOR'S ARMY

(By Fred Reed)

San Francisco Gotera, El Salvador.—For three days I have been a guest of the Morazan Battalion, headquartered in this low, poor, pastel, and dirty city. With me are an American doctor and another American, an authority on military small arms. We have been depressed by the Salvadoran army. Regarding which:

1. It is badly equipped. Its rifles and machine guns—M16's, G-3's, and M60's—are worn out, used up. The soldiers say they have never even seen cleaning gear. There are no spare parts, as for example bolts and barrels, and no armorers to repair broken weapons. We found troops using arctic-grade gun-oil, which was all they had. El Salvador is not in the arctic. Infantry weapons are easy to maintain, up to a point. Then you need knowledge and tools. For example, an untrained soldier cannot strip the bolt of a .50 caliber machine gun. The troops here tried, reassembled it incorrectly, and destroyed it when they fired it. Even an armorer needs all sorts of esoterica such as go-no-go gauges, barrel wrenches, stones, and expertise. If you don't have them, guns slowly become useless.

2. Their medical situation is criminal. They have almost no trained medics. The "medics" they have go into combat with a few field dressings, some penicillin, and maybe a bottle of glucose solution. The latter, my doctor friend growls, is almost useless as a blood replacement. A Salvadoran told us they had saline solution, but for some reason didn't use it. There are no medevac helicopters. The army has only 20 choppers, only some of which will work at a given time. They are used primarily for moving troops and cargo, and for medical purposes only when otherwise idle. This means that badly wounded men can wait six or eight hours before reaching care. They can't be treated in the field because no one knows how to do it. Often the wounded come out in trucks—bleeding, unsplinted, and alone, because there are no medics to ride with them. The level of medical ignorance is very high, and so is the death rate. A friend of mine tells of flying behind the lead chopper on a medevac run and noticing oil leaking along the side of the lead bird. It wasn't oil. A wounded man has a severed femoral artery and the door-gunner didn't know how to tie him off. He died. So goes this little war.

3. They need radios. We saw a few, but not nearly enough. A counter-guerrilla war involves patrols by small units, and close cooperation with mobile troops, as for example heliborne reaction forces. This is wild country. Without radios—lots of them—any soldiers you can't see might as well not exist. When a radio breaks, they can't fix it, and they can't quickly get anyone else to do it. It's a lonely feeling to be guarding a bridge or road out in that hot overgrown hill country, 20 feet from bushes you can't see through, with no way to call for help.

4. I saw no sign that people hereabouts are afraid of the army. Some of the police here have an evil reputation, very evil, but the army is a different entity. In regions I visited, the populace showed no signs of alarm or even particular interest when the army appeared.

5. Training is lousy, although I am told by friends who should know that it is improving. More on this next week.

6. To editorialize a bit, it looks as though the United States is doing just enough to get these people in deep trouble, but not enough to get them out. I'm afraid we will give them enough to keep them afloat while the war gets nice and vicious and big. Then we will pull the plug, as in Cambodia, and a bloodbath will follow.

Maybe we should not play half-seriously at war. Half-seriously at wars abroad entails responsibilities.●

REAL FAITH STARTS AT HOME, NOT IN SCHOOLS

HON. LANE EVANS

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 5, 1984

● Mr. EVANS of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, the proposed constitutional amendment on school prayer recently came to a vote in the Senate, and was the subject of a night-long session in the House. This proposed amendment sparked debate all over the country, including in the 17th Congressional District of Illinois which I represent.

One newspaper in my district, the Canton Daily Ledger, provided some insight on the school prayer issue by contrasting it with the Polish Government's ongoing attempt to forcibly remove signs of religious belief from the classroom. I believe that the following column by the newspaper's managing editor, Ross Gardiner, makes a persuasive argument against a school prayer amendment. Since this issue may well come before us again, I heartily recommend the column to my colleagues.

[From the Canton (Ill.) Daily Ledger, Mar. 9, 1984]

REAL FAITH STARTS AT HOME, NOT IN SCHOOLS

(By Ross Gardiner)

Two stories in yesterday's newspaper reflects different aspects of the struggle for freedom of religion.

In one report, some 400 Polish students took over a school to protest a government decision to remove crosses from the classroom. The crosses had been in the classrooms before this week but the regime had decided it would no longer permit signs of religious belief in schools run by an avowedly atheistic government.

In another account, senators debated splitting children into praying and nonpraying sections in American public schools as the controversy over prayer in the schools continued. The proposed constitutional amendment is being supported by the adminstration and is involving more time and debate than a number of other issues which the Senate has considered lately.

In Poland, the government tries to stamp out religion by removing visible signs of the faith in which the Polish people appear to believe in strongly. The Polish government is not trying to disassociate itself from the church, it is trying to convince the Polish people that the church should not exist.

In the United States, advocates of the school prayer amendment are trying to obtain time during which a student may exercise his religion, through prayer, in a public school. Some advocates of the amendment argue the permission of prayer in school would help stem a materialistic and anti-religious trend in modern America.

Opponents of the amendment argue Supreme Court decisions that prayer in public schools is unconstitutional are valid when viewed as separating church and state and encouraging the freedom to believe or not believe, or which religion to practice.

In essence, both situations—the Senate debate and the Polish school takeover—reflects a seemingly growing search in many cultures for the spiritual significance of life. Aside from the political significance, proponents of prayer in schools are as concerned as the Polish students that government action or inaction threatens their religions.

But does it threaten their faith?

Americans seem increasingly inclined to expect schools to become substitutes for the home. Poles are willing to fight against what they view as a direct government threat against the integrity of the home and family.

The Polish policy is an essential part of a government program to encourage the death of religion. The American policy, whatever its failures, is an attempt to assure that all Americans can practice their faiths as long as they do not impinge on the rights of others.

Many proponents of the prayer amendment have failed to grasp an essential point. While the Polish government actively discourages organized religion, the Polish people have earned the respect of many others around the world for their tenacious defense of their faith. The Poles don't expect the schools to provide the impetus to their faith. The Poles view the schools as participating in an active attempt to destroy their faith.

Americans cannot expect public schools or courts to encourage the spread of religion. They can expect them to support certain basic tenets common to most organized religions—such as respect for the lives of others, a sense of humanity and sharing and an awareness of communal responsibility.

Faith does not start in the classroom and, thankfully, American schools do not pursue a policy of discouraging religious belief. Faith, regardless of where prayers are uttered, begins within the family with the concern and help of other enlightened believers.

The school prayer issue is not one which involves the public school system as much as it reflects the unwillingness of many to turn to the real threats to religious belief in an increasingly mobile and very materialistic society.

Perhaps the Poles are learning that government cannot destroy faith and we Americans will learn that government cannot encourage it either. Faith starts in the home and the heart.●

HONDURAN DEMOCRACY SURVIVES A CRUCIAL TEST

HON. MICHAEL D. BARNES

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 5, 1984

● Mr. BARNES. Mr. Speaker, I was astounded to read last weekend of the ouster of the commander of the Honduran armed forces, Gen. Gustavo Alvarez Martinez, and other top military officers, by the constitutionally elected President of Honduras, Dr. Roberto Suazo Cordova.

It is a rare event in Latin America when civilian authorities succeed in removing military commanders from office. Usually it is the other way around. And in fact, many of us in the Congress were very concerned that General Alvarez and the military were acquiring too much power and authority relative to the civilian authorities.

Those of us who hope that democracy can be institutionalized in Honduras can take heart from the fact that the civilian Government of Honduras seems to be in control and that the military seems prepared to submit itself to the civilian President of the country.

Now that President Suazo has reasserted his control over the military and appointed new leadership, I hope that the Honduran military will renew its commitment to human rights. I have had the privilege of meeting with President Suazo, and I know of his personal commitment to human rights. By Central American standards, the Honduran military has a tradition of adherence to civilized human rights standards. Yet recently there have been disturbing reports of increases in arbitrary arrests, disappearances, and detention without trial by the security forces. I hope that there can now be an end to this sort of thing, and that the military will submit itself to the rule of law. It would be tragic if the Honduran military fell into the pattern that we see in some other countries in the region.

I think our friends in Honduras should know that both the Republican and the Democratic Parties support democracy in Central America and are watching developments in Honduras very closely. The people of Honduras should know that they and their President have our full support for their efforts to strengthen and institutionalize civilian democratic government.●

ICC: OLDEST REGULATORY BODY

HON. BYRON L. DORGAN

OF NORTH DAKOTA

Thursday, April 5, 1984

● Mr. DORGAN. Mr. Speaker, the Interstate Commerce Commission is our oldest regulatory body, created almost a century ago to administer the Interstate Commerce Act of 1887. Then as now, questions of interstate commerce involved highly charged conflicts among shippers, consumers, and railroad companies, setting region against region, big companies against small, management against labor. The ICC was designed to be a judicious arbiter, holding the public interest above any single self-interest.

No one could claim that the ICC has effectively fulfilled this role. Its history is a sorry saga of muddling through, veering this way and that, much as an inebriated driver tries to avoid a crash. It provides no counterweight, no lean against the wind of whichever interest group holds the upper hand that day.

Today the railroad companies call the tune. Their long financial nightmare of past decades led to congressional attempts at rescue, most recently the partially deregulating Staggers Act of 1980. Staggers was well intended, and had good justification, but it contained a fatal flaw: administration of many provisions was given to the ICC. And the ICC, dancing to the latest piper, has skewed the act to the disadvantage of shippers, consumers, farmers, utilities, other transportation modes: everyone, that is, except the railroads.

The ICC has adopted a most peculiar line of reasoning. It somehow has determined that the only aspect of interstate freight transportation important to the country is the bottom line of railroad holding companies. It is supposed to examine public convenience and necessity when a railroad seeks to abandon a branch line. Instead, the ICC is concerned only with whether the line can meet an opportunity cost threshold, set so high that since Staggers, 378 ICC decisions on abandonment cases produced only 8 denials. It is supposed to limit railroad rates when competition does not constrain a railroad's monopoly power. Yet, the ICC has skewed the definition of competition to such an extent that challenging rates is virtually impossible.

According to the ICC, there is enough competition to restrain a railroad which is the sole shipping source for a coal producer if the same coal can be shipped from another region of the country, or even if users of the coal could switch economically to another fuel. The ICC is supposed to disclose the essential terms of contracts between railroads and shippers—newly permitted under Staggers—to reduce any chance of price discrimination rightly feared by smaller shippers. Yet, the ICC stands on the notion that the identity of the shipper and the price terms of the contract are not essential pieces of information. It will not disclose these terms, foreclosing any answer to the question of whether price discrimination actually exists.

The litany could continue. The ICC has decided all too often to side with the railroad companies. Many of us are starting to hear from damaged parties, who see their hopes crystalized in Staggers for a revitalized transportation system confronting the blind wall of ICC intransigence. Coal and grain shippers, utilities, barge companies and truckers share common ground, allied against the decisions of the ICC.

Rather than providing a judicious, balanced interpretation of the law, the ICC has become a mouthpiece for the railroads.

One reason for this lies in the backgrounds of the ICC commissioners. Forty-four commissioners have been appointed since the end of World War II. One had experience with agriculture, as the owner of a large farm; another had experience with natural resources, having worked for oil companies. No other commissioner had training or experience with industries using the transportation system, nor with small businesses. Meanwhile, five of the commissioners had previous ties to railroad companies, and over two-thirds were lawyers.

Current law is silent on qualifications and background, other than saying ICC commissioners must be balanced between political parties and cannot have a financial stake in the regulated carriers.

We think it is time to change that. Mr. SABO and I propose that we require at least four commissioners of the ICC to have backgrounds in, and represent, producers and users of agricultural and natural resource products. In addition, we propose that at least two of these commissioners come from independent businesses.

Commissioners with these backgrounds and interests will have a deep seated, fundamental grasp of the realities of interstate commerce. They will understand what a strong, reliable transportation system means to farmers, to small towns located at the end of a branch line, to urban residents digging deep into their pockets to pay for electricity. They will realize the difference between the ICC's current concern for the railroad companies, and its lack of concern for the railroad system.

They will bring a needed attribute to the table, a seasoned view of real life economics.

They will bring a balance to the ICC, a counterweight to theories gleaned from the latest textbooks.

It is not unusual to provide representational balance on our commissions and boards which treat railroad questions. The National Railroad Passenger Corporation (AMTRAK), the Railroad Retirement Board, and the National Railroad Adjustment Board all have membership criteria which attempt to balance conflicting interests.

It is time to replace the ICC's stale air of cloistered thinking with the refreshing breeze of commonsense. Congress has tried to remedy the ills besetting freight transportation, but the balance sought has been ignored by the regulators. We can get the balance by giving important users of the transportation system representation at the ICC.●

REAGAN ADMINISTRATION EXERCISES JUDICIOUS SELF-RESTRAINT IN CLASSIFYING INFORMATION

HON. G. WILLIAM WHITEHURST

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 5, 1984

● Mr. WHITEHURST. Mr. Speaker, by section 5.2 of Executive Order 12356, President Reagan directed the Information Security Oversight Office of the General Services Administration to ride herd on executive branch agencies in classifying information. That office has independent authority to require reports from executive agencies, to audit the classification practices of those agencies, and to order them to comply with proper classification practices, if that becomes necessary.

Recently, the Information Security Oversight Office issued its fiscal year 1983 report to the President on Government classification of information. The report demonstrates that the Government has used the classification stamp less—not more—under President Reagan's Executive Order 12356 than under President Carter's corresponding Executive Order 12065.

Original classification decisions, that is, decisions to keep particular information secret, declined by 18 percent in fiscal year 1983, the first full year under President Reagan's executive order. Agencies provided a date or event certain for automatic declassification of a document 35 percent of the time when originally classifying information under the Reagan order; the corresponding figure under the Carter order was 10 percent. Under the mandatory declassification review provisions of the Reagan order, 75 percent of the documents requested were declassified and released in full. An additional 10 percent were declassified and released in part.

The fiscal year 1983 report notes that derivative classification increased slightly in fiscal year 1983, but derivative classification is only a matter of applying the appropriate classification stamps to the face of a document which restates information for which an original classification decision has already been made. Thus, derivative classification, unlike original classification, does not result in otherwise available information being kept secret.

Historians and journalists should find comfort in the knowledge that President Reagan's executive order has reduced the number of original decisions to keep information secret. Executive Order 12356 is accomplishing its twin goals of protecting information which must be kept secret to protect the Nation and preventing the classification of information whose release would not damage national defense or foreign policy interests.●

CALL TO CONSCIENCE VIGIL: THE SLEPAKS

HON. DANTE B. FASCELL

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 5, 1984

● Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, it is with mixed emotion that I participate in this year's "Call to Conscience Vigil" on behalf of Soviet Jews, organized by our distinguished colleague from Pennsylvania, Representative COUGHLIN. I am honored to take part in such a noble endeavor and commend Representative COUGHLIN for his efforts. Yet, I am deeply saddened by the circumstances in the Soviet Union today that necessitate such a vigil. I particularly regret that it is necessary for me to take the floor today in behalf of a family which has been forcibly separated for almost 15 years.

This is the 8th consecutive year, Mr. Speaker, that I have called the attention of our colleagues to the plight of Maria and Vladimir Slepak. By all accounts, the Slepaks are a remarkable family, one that has paid dearly for their efforts to live as a family. Vladimir, a radio and television engineer, Maria, a physician, and their two sons, Aleksandr and Leonid, first applied to emigrate in 1970 to rejoin Maria's mother in Israel. After 8 long years of refusals, the parents hung a banner on the balcony of their Moscow apartment proclaiming their plea to emigrate. For this act, Vladimir was convicted of malicious hooliganism and sentenced to serve a 5-year term of internal exile. Maria, who received a suspended sentence, joined him in Siberia, where they lived under difficult conditions. Returning to Moscow in December 1982, Vladimir and Maria continued their efforts to emigrate, now to rejoin their sons who were finally allowed to leave and the grandchildren they have never seen. Surely 15 years is long enough to be denied one's basic human rights.

Mr. Speaker, after speaking about the Slepak family in the congressional vigil for 8 years, after corresponding with them, and after meeting Mrs. Slepak's mother and coming to know their two sons. I have developed a special affinity for this family. I look forward to the day when I meet Maria and Vladimir personally here in Washington. Last year, I expressed my sincere hope that it would not be necessary for me to take the floor this year on behalf of the Slepaks. While I regret that my wish remains unfulfilled, I pledge to continue my efforts at this critical time for the Slepak family and for all Soviet Jews.

As you know, Mr. Speaker, emigration rates have plummeted at the same time as Soviet anti-Semitism has intensified. Yet those of us who are concerned about this issue—and we are many—must not despair. I am convinced that, just as over 250,000 Soviet Jews gained their freedom in the 1970's, so shall their coreligionists also be freed. The Soviet Government must eventually realize the depth of our commitment to this cause and the seriousness with which we view their responsibilities under the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, the International Covenant on Human Rights and the Helsinki and Madrid Agreements. In order to improve Soviet-American relations, which sorely need repair, the Soviet leadership must be willing to abide by their international obligations in the field of human rights.

Until that time, however, we must redouble our efforts. As chairman of the Helsinki Commission, I join with our many colleagues in reaffirming my support for Soviet Jewry. I pledge, if need be, to participate in the "Call to Conscience Vigil" for Soviet Jews again next year and every year thereafter until our goal of freedom for Soviet Jews is achieved.●

PROPOSED BAN ON CHEMICAL WEAPONS

HON. MARGE ROUKEMA

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 5, 1984

● Mrs. ROUKEMA. Mr. Speaker, I rise to commend President Reagan's announcement that he will send Vice President BUSH to Geneva to present to the U.N. Committee on Disarmament a U.S. treaty proposal banning chemical weapons worldwide. As the President noted, the shortcomings of existing chemical weapons treaties have been made clear in recent years through the alleged use of chemical weapons in Afghanistan, Southeast Asia, and in the Iran-Iraq conflict.

While I support the President's latest initiative toward arms control, I firmly believe we must disassociate any chemical weapons treaty from a renewed effort to buildup our present chemical weapons stockpile. We cannot ignore the fact that the United States already has a large, existing stockpile of toxic chemical munitions to deter other countries from using chemical warfare and to retaliate if deterrence is unsuccessful. (GAO July 1, 1983) This Nation has enough lethal chemical munitions for at least 30 days of war that would result in millions of civilian deaths. The argument that the United States must embark on production of new chemical weapons because without a modern and credible deterrent the prospects for achieving a comprehensive ban would be diminished, in my opinion, is simply not valid.

The arguments against renewing production of chemical weapons in the United States are compelling. We cannot ignore the fact that chemical weapons are much less efficient to use than conventional weapons and are of dubious military value. They are primarily offensive weapons which would kill more innocent civilians than enemy soldiers.

Nor can we ignore the foreign policy implications. The perception that the United States is insincere about the treaty proposal or abandoning its efforts to ban chemical weapons would encourage other nations to produce them. The potential consequences are serious. Unfriendly nations and terrorist groups, who do not have access to nuclear weapons, could easily turn to lethal chemical weapons which are relatively easy to manufacture requiring little technological capability.

To manufacture chemical weapons at the same time we are trying to ban them, frankly, is contradictory and is likely to have a chilling effect on future arms control efforts.

What we need now is to move full speed ahead with President Reagan's initiative for a chemical weapons ban. However, we should not, at the same time we are taking this step forward, take a step backward by simultaneously producing new lethal binary munitions. The code of civilized behavior we seek among nations should lead us away from, rather than toward, production of chemical weapons.●

RICH PAY BIGGER TAX SHARE UNDER REAGAN

HON. CONNIE MACK

OF FLORIDA

Thursday, April 5, 1984

● Mr. MACK. Mr. Speaker, during the Baltimore conference, which my colleagues and I held this past year, I was fortunate to meet Mr. Warren Brookes, a most distinguished conservative columnist whose work appears regularly in the Boston Herald and other prominent newspapers throughout the country.

Mr. Brookes' work exemplifies the growing depth and intellectualism of conservative journalism around the United States and, for that reason, I would like to share a recent column written by him which accurately and insightfully refutes those who argue that President Reagan's 1981 tax cut program, and tax cuts in general, favor the rich at the expense of the income groups.

I find this particular column particularly relevant in the context of our budget debate and commend his work to my colleagues.

RICH PAY BIGGER TAX SHARE UNDER REAGAN

For three years Democrats have argued that President Reagan's tax cut program "favors the rich at the expense of the lower income groups," and they have successfully sold this idea to the public.

Now, an analysis of actual 1982 tax returns by the Internal Revenue Service shows exactly the opposite took place.

Under the first year of the Reagan tax cut, the share of taxes paid by the "rich" (those with incomes over $50,000) rose dramatically, while the tax burden of those with incomes under $50,000 fell sharply (see table).

In 1982, the year when individual tax rates were cut by an average of 7.5 percent on all salaries and wages, and the top tax rates on unearned income were cut from 70 to 50 percent, taxes actually paid by those with incomes of more than $100,000 increased by 13 percent. Those with incomes over $50,000 paid 6 percent more in taxes.

At the same time, taxes paid by those with incomes below $20,000 declined by 12 percent, while those with incomes between $20,000 and $50,000 actually paid 4 percent less.

Even though total income tax collections declined by 2 percent in 1982, those with incomes above $500,000 paid 40 percent more taxes in 1982 than they did in 1981.

One of the primary reasons for this huge increase was a 55 percent rise in the number of returns filed by those reporting $1 million or more in adjusted gross income—from 5,283 returns in 1981 to 8,203 in 1982.

As a result of this rapid rise in collections from the rich, the distribution of the federal tax burden shifted sharply to the upper income levels, exactly contrary to the claims of presidential candidates Walter Mondale and Gary Hart.

In 1981 those with incomes under $20,000 paid 17.1 percent of the total income tax collections. In 1982 that share dropped to 15.5 percent, the largest such drop in a single year since 1965 (under the Kennedy-Johnson across-the-board tax reduction).

At the same time, the share paid by those with incomes above $50,000 rose from 32.9 percent in 1981 to 35.4 percent in 1982—an 8 percent shift of the tax burden toward the rich.

The shift was even more dramatic among those with incomes above $100,000 whose share of the federal income taxes rose from 15 percent to 17.3 percent, a 15 percent rise, while the share paid by millionaires rose by 41 percent in 1982.

Incidentally, many Democrats, including Gary Hart, have already endorsed this idea in the Bradley-Gephardt tax plan to cut top marginal rates to 30 percent, a plan that has since been upstaged by a 25 percent top-rate proposal by Kemp and Sen. Robert Kasten of Wisconsin.

Kemp noted, "This same upward shift in the tax burden took place under the Kennedy-Johnson tax cuts of 1963-65, when tax rates were cut by about 25 percent across-the-board."

"As I recall," Kemp continued, "between 1963 and 1966, the share of taxes paid by the under-$10,000 group fell by 23 percent, while the share of taxes paid by those over $50,000 increased by 36 percent, while total revenues grew."

"We see the same effect here," Kemp said, "even though 1982 was a recession year, and even though tax rates were cut an average of about 10 percent, total tax collections only dropped by 2 percent, while collections from upper income groups actually rose by a very solid 13 percent.

"Had it not been for the Federal Reserve's chokehold on credit, which produced the recession long before the first tax cuts could take effect," Kemp argued, "I am convinced we would have seen total 1982 revenues rise as they did in 1965."

Although tax returns for 1983 are still coming in, and it is too early for an analysis of them, the preliminary indications are that the same effect is taking place, as receipts from those filing estimated taxes (typically the upper income groups) are running substantially ahead of those from payroll withholding.

"This means," Kemp said, "that my friend, former Congressman Bill Brodhead (D) of Michigan was right, back in March of 1981, when he, with Tip O'Neill's blessing, offered to give us an immediate reduction in 70 percent unearned income rate down to 50 percent, instead of phasing it in over three years as the president was proposing."

"He told me then," Kemp added, "that he knew this 'wouldn't cost anything', because it would lure so much wealthy income out of shelters back into the productive economy."

The trouble was the "price" the Democrats asked of Kemp and President Reagan for this concession was the elimination of the third year tax cut and indexing, which primarily benefits middle income people.

"This shows the hypocracy of the liberals," Kemp said, "They were willing to trade an immediate reduction of tax rates on the rich, which they knew wouldn't be costly, in order not to give a 10 percent third year reduction or indexing to the middle class. Now, they turn around and assault us for favoring the rich."

The new Treasury Department analysis should put a lie to that whole argument, but with the usual liberal bias of the national press, don't count on it. The "big lie" has been well sold.●

REFUGEE POLICY CONSIDERED

HON. BARNEY FRANK

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 5, 1984

● Mr. FRANK. Mr. Speaker, my friend and respected colleague, Mr. MOAKLEY, has introduced a bill, H.R. 4447, which I think offers a modest, reasonable approach to the problems facing Salvadoran refugees in this country. It would mandate a freeze on deportation of Salvadoran refugees for a period of 3 years, while the President commissions a study and Congress holds hearings on the situation these refugees face, in El Salvador and in transit to the United States.

Mr. Speaker, I have felt, for a long time, as have many of my colleagues, that the need to grant refugees from El Salvador EVD status, as we have to refugees from many different countries, is a simple matter of fairness. The Subcommittee on Immigration, Refugees, and International Law of the Judiciary Committee will shortly be holding hearings on this bill. On March 17, the Boston Globe published an editorial which I think states the case very clearly, and I ask that it be made part of the RECORD.

Since the civil war in El Savador broke out four years ago. 300,000 to 500,000 Salvadorans have fled that ravaged country and found their way into the United States. Today there are an estimated 12,000 Salvadorans living in the Boston area.

Only a handful of these refugees have been granted political asylum. An estimated 15,000 Salvadorans have been deported since 1981, forced to return to their own country. The status of those who remain in this country is uncertain. They suffer with the cruel knowledge that they can be apprehended, detained and deported to El Salvador at any time and, if so, they may face death.

The Reagan Administration has been reluctant to grant asylum to Salvadorans because that would be an embarrassing acknowledgement that the US-supported regime is representative, and because it fears that humanitarian treatment would invite a steadily increasing stream of refugees.

The Administration contends that Salvadoran refugees are drawn to the United States principally for economic gain. It will not admit that refugees come here because conditions in their own country are dangerous. As a fallback, it takes the position that applicants for asylum must prove they are in special danger of persecution. Since violent death in El Salvador is widespread, it is hard for refugees to prove that they will be singled out.

The State Department has also refused requests to grant Salvadoran refugees "extended voluntary departure" status. Granted at the discretion of the Attorney General, on the recommendation of the Secretary of State, this status permits citizens of countries experiencing dangerous conditions to remain in the United States temporarily and obtain authorization to work. It is revoked once hostilities subside at home. Refugees from Poland, Lebanon, Ethiopia and Afghanistan currently enjoy such temporary status.

Rep. Joseph Moakley (D-Mass.) has sponsored legislation that would mandate similar protection for Salvadorans. The proposal would freeze deportations for three years. It would also require a presidential study of the refugee situation and hearings to allow Congress to determine a permanent solution for the problem. Identical legislation has been filed in the Senate by Dennis DeConcini, an Arizona Democrat; hearings are scheduled early next month.

The Salvadoran refugee population in the United States cuts across class lines and includes professionals as well as peasants. Many were better off in their homeland than they are here, living as illegal aliens, hiding in cramped apartments, working in menial, low-paying jobs if they are lucky enough to find employment. Many plan to return to El Salvador when and if peace is restored.

Legislation to help these people deserves broad bipartisan support on humanitarian grounds. The measure provides immediate relief but judiciously avoids an outright challenge of the current Administration's failures in Central America.

The Moakley-DeConcini proposal would allow Salvadoran refugees temporary peace of mind while the simmering political questions over El Salvador and its neighbors are debated and resolved.●

WESTERN MASSACHUSETTS IS PROUD OF LENOX GIRLS

HON. SILVIO O. CONTE

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 5, 1984

● Mr. CONTE. Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to take this opportunity to honor the Lenox Memorial High School girls' basketball team. This year, the Lady Millionaires carried on the proud tradition of athletic excellence that we have come to expect from Lenox Memorial. This season, as in seasons past, the Lenox Memorial girls' basketball team, under the expert coaching of Mr. Len Miller, managed once again to capture the honors due them as a team of dedicated and hard-working young athletes. Western Massachusetts thanks the Lenox women hoopsters for honoring us by capturing the elusive Massachusetts State championships as the finale to a fine season.

These young women have shown the seriousness of purpose and athletic potential which will grow if we support it. The Lenox story is testimony to the fact that further development of women's sports programs is crucial. Such development has brought the accomplishment on the playing field and sense of achievement in the honorable tradition of amateur athletes of either sex.

The 1983-84 Lady Millionaires are a unique team rich in history—7 of the 14 players have been together as a team for 4 years. The record shows that this association has been just incredible. Their most recent win—at the Massachusetts State championships—constitutes their 65th consecutive win. Western Massachusetts has also noted with pride that the Lenox Memorial girls' basketball team has not lost one game in the western Massachusetts division in the last 4 years.

What is the reason for this truly remarkable success? Perhaps the reason for their stunning accomplishment has been the long hours and patient leadership of Coach Miller. The coach's task of bringing together 14 individuals and molding them into a team is never easy, but Coach Miller makes his job appear effortless. Or, perhaps the key to the Lenox triumph lies in the spirit of those 14 girls. Led by team tricaptains Cathleen and Colleen Lahart and Deborah Carey, the Lady Millionaires have the solidarity and coordination among themselves that is a crucial ingredient in a team of real winners.

I have looked over the record of this team; I am astounded by the list of honors that it has accumulated over the years. The Lady Millionaires have run away with the Berkshire County girls championship and the western Massachusetts division championship for the past 3 years. They have bulldozed their way through the highly competitive field each year. No team has ever kept them from victory. Proposition 2½ has given them their only real challenge in recent years by twice canceling the Massachusetts State tournament.

The Lenox Memorial High School girls' basketball team has received these team honors and other special individual honors over the years. In 1982, for example, senior Lisa Boenitz was the recipient of the Springfield Republican's Michael Bogen Award. Boenitz and fellow senior Cathleen Lahart have received the honor of being voted most valuable player in their western Massachusetts division during their careers and senior Colleen Lahart was given the Sportsmanship Award by the referee association this year. This is a truly commendable group of girls.

In total, the team will lose seven seniors this year: Lisa Boenitz, Jill Milne, Cathleen Lahart, Colleen Lahart, Deborah Carey, Paula Noyes, and Dana Archey. Their talents and energy will not be lost, however, as major colleges around the country have shown their interest in having the girls join their basketball squads.

Coach Miller will be sorry to see these seniors graduate. He does, however, have a promising and strong group of younger starters returning. Judging by the record, we can rest assured that Kelly Lachance, Michelle Pickard, Martha Lucy, Roxanne Trombly, Cheryl Sibley, Laurie Lafave, Darcie Carey, and Manager Sharon Majewski will carry on the Lenox torch of virtuosity and teamwork.

Lenox is proud of its 1983-84 girls' basketball team and so am I. I find it heartening and rare, indeed, to find such devotion to goals and integrity among sportsmen.●

A FREE TRADE ZONE WITH ISRAEL

HON. THOMAS J. DOWNEY

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 5, 1984

● Mr. DOWNEY of New York. Mr. Speaker, the distinguished Trade Subcommittee chairman, SAM GIBBONS, and I are today introducing a long-awaited bill authorizing the President to enter into and implement a free trade agreement with Israel.

Specifically, the bill would provide authority, which the President does not have under current law, to enter into a trade agreement with the Government of Israel providing for duty-free treatment and elimination of other import restrictions on products entering the United States from Israel. By the same token, we can expect that U.S. exporters to Israel will benefit by unencumbered access to the $8 billion Israeli market.

On November 29, 1983, President Reagan and Israeli Prime Minister Shamir agreed to proceed with bilateral negotiations on a United States-Israel two-way free trade area following up an Israeli Government proposal of 1981. Negotiations began in mid-January 1984, between the two governments on the broad parameters of an agreement, and initial consultations have taken place with U.S. private sector interests.

It is time now for Congress to get on with legislation which will provide the necessary legal authority to make good on those November promises. In addition to removing time-consuming and expensive tariffs and duties for U.S. goods entering Israel, a free trade zone will remove any disadvantage U.S. exports to Israel might experience one a recently signed free trade area agreement between Israel and the European Economic Community takes effect. The United States enjoys a trade surplus with Israel of about $700 million at the present time which is an important offset to our miserable trading situation vis-a-vis many other industrialized countries around the world.

Care will be given to the impact on domestic industries of free entry of Israeli products before the specifics of an agreement are concluded. It should be remembered in any case that only 0.5 percent of all U.S. imports come from Israel and that because of allowances provided already under the generalized system of preferences (GSP) 90 percent of all Israeli imports already enter the United States duty-free.

Technically, the bill grants the President authority to proclaim the continuation and modification of tariff treatment and modification of import restrictions as he determines necessary to carry out the trade agreement. And, these authorities apply only if the trade agreement is reciprocal and mutually advantageous.

The Trade Subcommittee of the Ways and Means Committee, to whom the bill will be referred, will hold hearings on the bill as soon as its schedule permits.

I encourage my colleagues to support us in this endeavor and ask that a copy of the bill be printed here:

The President may enter into a reciprocal and mutually advantageous trade agreement with the Government of Israel providing for the continuance of existing duty-free treatment of, and the elimination of existing duties and other import restrictions on, articles that are the product of Israel and may proclaim such continuances and modifications regarding the tariff treatment of, and such modifications of import restrictions on, such articles as the President determines to be necessary or appropriate to carry out the trade agreement.●

TRIBUTE TO CHARLES McKENNA

HON. BRUCE F. VENTO

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 5, 1984

● Mr. VENTO. Mr. Speaker, today I wish to draw to my colleagues attention, the retirement of a St. Paul labor and community leader and a good friend of mine, Charles McKenna.

Charles McKenna has been a member in good standing of the Twin Cities Local 512, International Association of Bridge, Structural and Ornamental Iron Workers for over 40 years and has served as an officer of local 512 for almost 30 years.

As an officer of local 512, Chuck has been instrumental in improving the quality of life and education for ironworkers and other Minnesotans.

In large part, through Chuck's efforts, a strong and vibrant apprenticeship program was created. This program has provided crucial training and employment opportunities for many. Under the direction of the joint apprenticeship committee, which he helped to establish and headed, the success of the apprenticeship program will continue.

Chuck has served the members of local 512 well. Through his efforts the membership have a model health and welfare program as well as a sound pension plan. These benefits have become a benchmark for many others.

Besides serving the local 512 membership, Chuck McKenna has served the people of Twin Cities area well. As a member of the board of directors for the McKnight Foundation, he has been a driving force in the good works of that organization.

Mr. Speaker, I count on Chuck McKenna as a good friend and adviser. I will miss his active participation in local 512 but know that I can still depend on his wise counsel and experience. As he enters retirement, I want to wish Chuck and his wife Dory, a long and happy life.●

KEVIN JORDAN WINS LEGION CONTEST

HON. JOHN R. McKERNAN, JR.

OF MAINE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 5, 1984

● Mr. McKERNAN. Mr. Speaker, today I would like to give recognition to one of my constituents, Kevin Jordan of Wiscasset, Maine, who is the winner of the Maine American Legion Oratorical Contest.

On March 9, Kevin, a junior at Wiscasset High School, was selected as the State champion for his speech entitled, "The Preamble and Its Relationship With The Constitution." Kevin will be competing in the regional finals in Boston during April, with the chance of moving on to the national finals.

Kevin is the son of Mrs. Stephanie Jordan of Wiscasset and Anthony G. Jordan of Brunswick.

Contestants from all over the State of Maine participated in this oratorical contest, with representatives from seven State districts chosen to compete in the State finals.

Winners in the competition are chosen on the basis of their knowledge and presentation of the Constitution. The contest is held to promote study and interest in the Constitution.

It is a great honor to be selected as Maine's representative in the American Legion Oratorical Contest. I commend Kevin on his outstanding efforts and achievements.●

MAJ. RICHARD BEAVERS

HON. STENY H. HOYER

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 5, 1984

● Mr. HOYER. Mr. Speaker, last December our community suffered a devastating blow when the Prince Georges County Police Department lost a fine officer and leader, Maj. Richard Beavers. Major Beavers was struck down in a senseless robbery attempt as he was sitting, off duty, in a parking lot.

The loss of Major Beavers, who was the commander of the Oxon Hill station, was a tragic and shocking event. Major Beavers was extremely popular with his men, and his depth of concern in his job and in his responsibilities created a positive feeling in all who knew him.

Richard Joseph Beavers joined the police department on October 16, 1967, and was assigned to the Hyattsville station. He was promoted to detective in the vice section in 1970. Further promotions were swift—in 1972, he was promoted to detective first class; in 1974, to sergeant; in 1976 to the rank of lieutenant; and then, in 1979 to captain and transferred to operations duty officer. In 1980 he was named commander of the Clinton District station, and in 1982 to the same post at the Oxon Hill station. He was promoted to the rank of major posthumously in November.

Major Beavers was born and raised in Prince Georges County, graduating from Northwestern High School in 1964. In 1970 he married Diana L. Miller and they had two children, Joseph Richard and Shannell Shannon.

During his service in the police department, Major Beavers received an Award of Merit and 24 letters of commendation for his work. He was considered one of the bright young men of the department and he was well-loved by his coworkers. At the time of his death, he was counseling a former employee and her family.

Clearly the motive in this senseless killing was robbery, and two men have been arrested and charged with Major Beavers' murder.

Maj. Richard Beavers reflected the real heart and soul of the law enforcement fraternity. His sense of duty to the community in which he lived and worked was paralleled by his fellowship and sense of duty to his fellow officers.

Mr. Speaker, we in the Prince Georges community have suffered a great loss. Major Beavers was a fine man, and his contributions, his humor and his spirit will long be remembered. I know my colleagues join with me in sending heartfelt condolences to his family and friends.●

DISCRIMINATORY MEMBERSHIP POLICIES IN PRIVATE CLUBS

HON. SAM GEJDENSON

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 5, 1984

● Mr. GEJDENSON. Mr. Speaker, we are all aware that there are still a good many private clubs in this country that have discriminatory membership policies.

What is often forgotten, however, is that members of these clubs often use them for business purposes, and claim business entertainment and lodging deductions when patronizing these establishments. This amounts to a government subsidy of discrimination, and I believe this is wrong.

It is for this reason that today I am introducing the Business Expense Deductions Act of 1984. This bill would disallow the business deduction for entertainment and travel-related lodging when such activity takes place in a private club that discriminates on the basis of race, sex, religion, or national origin. This bill does not prevent anyone from joining the club of his or her choice—it simply puts an end to the practice of conducting tax-deductible business in a discriminatory establishment.

Under this legislation, a private club would be required to submit to the IRS a simple form stating that their membership policies are nondiscriminatory. If a club refuses to submit such a form, expenditures in that club are no longer tax deductible.

After a club submits the form, they will be sent a public notice certifying that they are nondiscriminatory, and that expenditures there are eligible for the business deduction. If a complaint of discrimination is filed against such a club, the IRS would then have the ability to examine the organization's membership lists and investigate their membership policies.

The bill would also create a separate line on the income-tax return form for reporting expense deductions used in any facility which is not open to the general public. This provision will make it easier to enforce the policy, without requiring an audit of all the business expenses reported on a questioned tax return.

This bill has been endorsed by the American Federation of State, Federal, and Municipal Employees and the national women's political caucus. The National Organization for Women, the NAACP, and the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights have all endorsed the concept, and are currently reviewing the legislative language. All of these organizations share my fundamental belief that ending the policy of Government subsidy of discrimination is a step that is long overdue.

I urge my colleagues to join me and this distinguished group of organizations, and cosponsor this fair and equitable change in our tax policy.●

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 5, 1984

● Mr. OWENS. Mr. Speaker, due to pressing business in my district, I was unavoidably detained in New York during the votes on April 3. Had I been present, I would have voted "yea" on H.R. 4072, the conference report on the Wheat Improvement Act; "yea" on H.R. 4707, the Arizona Wilderness Act, and "yea" on H.R. 5026, the Truth in Lending Act amendments.●

THE PHILOMATH OBSERVES A CENTURY OF SERVICE TO THE ART OF LEARNING

HON. GEORGE C. WORTLEY

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 5, 1984

● Mr. WORTLEY. Mr. Speaker, in the town of Manlius, N.Y., my hometown, there exists an organization dedicated to the furtherance of learning and the understanding of people, wherever they exist in this world.

This dedicated body is known as the Philomath.

Since the earliest days of our community, women of the Philomath have met every 2 weeks for intellectual discussions, to probe issues and topics of the day, to study cultures, and review literature.

The women of our town, in good times and in times of hardship, have kept the torch of learning burning brightly for the expansion of their minds and for the enrichment of knowledge of our families.

On Tuesday, April 12, the Philomath will observe its 100th anniversary of continuing community service.

Mr. Speaker, it is with signal pride that I bring this commemoration to the attention of the Congress.

To the current president of the Philomath, Mrs. Agnes Cook of Fayetteville, N.Y., and to the members of her outstanding organization, I add my congratulation.●

PORTUGUESE-AMERICAN SCHOLARSHIP FOUNDATION

HON. PETER W. RODINO, JR.

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 5, 1984

● Mr. RODINO. Mr. Speaker, for 18 years the Portuguese-American Scholarship Foundation has given financial assistance to deserving students of Portuguese heritage. I am very proud to recognize this group for their outstanding contribution to the education of our young people.

The foundation was organized by community leaders who recognized the need to provide not only financial assistance to members of the Portuguese-American community, but to encourage young people to seek higher education.

On Friday, April 13, the foundation will present scholarships to five people, including two from my home city of Newark—Antonio Raimundo and Rosemarie Bola. Since the scholarships began, over 100 deserving students have been awarded funds—including another one of my constituents, Joaquin Correira.

At the dinner, a special person in the Portuguese community will be honored—Evaristo Cruz, Sr. He is the founder and president of the Cruz Construction Co., which he built from a small construction firm into a multimillion dollar company. Born in Portugal in 1917, Cruz came to the United States at the age of 29, leaving his wife and four children in Portugal until he was settled and could bring them here to start a better life. They joined him in 1950. After working in construction, Cruz decided to start his own company, and with a small initial investment, he built the Cruz Construction Co. into the success it is today.

In 1963, Cruz was fined by a municipal court for hiring 14 Portuguese aliens as laborers on a sewer project. The basis for this fine was a discriminatory law that prohibited aliens from working on public works projects in New Jersey. After 2 years of litigation and considerable legal expenses, Cruz won a reversal from the New Jersey State Supreme Court which unanimously ruled that the 1899 statute was no longer valid. His efforts in this case brought about a more equitable situation for thousands of workers who followed.

Evaristo Cruz has played an important role in many civic activities, and I am very pleased that the Portuguese-American Scholarship Foundation is honoring him at this very special event.

I also wish to recognize other individuals who have played a major role in the success of the foundation—Richard Gomes, the foundation's current president; Fred Perry, chairman of the dinner committee and senior vice president of the Broad National Bank; and Mrs. Ilvora Rodriques, the founder and first president of the Portuguese-American Scholarship Foundation.●

CHEMICAL WEAPONS TREATY PROPOSAL

HON. ED BETHUNE

OF ARKANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 5, 1984

● Mr. BETHUNE. Mr. Speaker, I was pleased to hear the President announce last night that he is sending Vice President BUSH to the Conference on Disarmament in Geneva to present a treaty proposal for banning chemical weapons. Secretary Shultz is to be commended for his statements at the Stockholm talks, where he announced that the United States was preparing this treaty. The only sour note was produced by the Department of Defense, who as recently as 2 weeks ago were trying to block the treaty.

I imagine the thought that we might actually get a treaty banning chemical weapons frightens the Department of Defense. They are stuck in a mindset of build, build, build, regardless of whether the weapons are needed or even work properly. Once again, this Congress is facing a request for the production of binary nerve gas when the DOD knows we already have a huge stockpile of unitary chemical weapons that are useable, deliverable and safe. If we got a treaty, not only would the DOD not get to have these new weapons, they would have to go out of the nerve gas business entirely.

The Soviets also need to get out of the nerve gas business. This treaty proposal gives them an opportunity to prove they want to.●

CONGRESS MUST FULLY ADDRESS OUR CITIZENS NEEDS

HON. KATIE HALL

OF INDIANA

Thursday, April 5, 1984

● Mrs. HALL of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, the administration's budget request demonstrates a total departure from the need to continually develop local communities. Our cities desperately need funds to continue services and aid to citizens. Job displacement, deteriorating fixtures, and overburdened Government services are problems that must be fully addressed by any budget the Congress approves.

Community and regional development programs support local economic development efforts by offering grants, loan guarantees, and technical assistance to cities and States. This support for public works, economic development, and revitalization projects will help create jobs.

The unemployment rate in my district is 22 percent. That is three times higher than the national average. Government services in northwest Indiana are heavily burdened now and could reach a point of crisis if another economic catastrophe occurs. If funding for community development remains at the present levels, localities would experience a double-digit percentage decline in the spending power of the funds they receive.

The Congressional Black Caucus (CBC) budget alternative would increase the fiscal year 1985 community development block grant funding to $4.5 million. This $1 billion increase over the administration's request is in response to the serious needs of our cities. It is a wise increase because funds for urban development generate private investment and in turn thousands of jobs.

The Nation is plagued by outdated manufacturing plants, deteriorating roads, bridges, sewers, and water systems. To allow the Nation's infrastructure to crumble away would not only jeopardize public safety but cost a great deal more in the long run. The CBC alternative includes a new National Development Bank with a budget authority of $5 million. This new National Development Bank would provide the funding necessary to cities and manufacturers to help rebuild and upgrade vital public services essential to the well-being of urban citizens, and the functioning and revitalization of American businesses and basic industries.

Programs exist to monitor regional concerns and problems. These programs have worked for revitalization in areas that have suffered long and hard from economic infirmity. The CBC alternative retains the Appalachian Regional Commission and other regional development programs at Congressional Budget Office baseline levels. Housing for the elderly would be increased by $332 million providing an additional 16,000 units of low-income housing for older Americans. Government disaster relief programs would be maintained at current service levels.

In all, the CBC alternative demonstrates a greater compassion for the disadvantaged and working Americans. The CBC community development proposal recognizes the problems and essential needs of this nation's cities and towns. If community development programs are not funded adequately, some communities will have to suspend vital services and be forced to raise taxes. No one wants to further burden middle America. Inadequate funding for these programs would amount to another economic catastrophe for the millions of unemployed who in better times worked so hard for the growth of America.●

HONORING THESE FINE PENNSYLVANIANS

HON. GUS YATRON

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 5, 1984

● Mr. YATRON. Mr. Speaker, for over 30 years Sallie I. Pawling, of the 16th ward in Reading, Pa., Mamie L. Hartman of the Borough of Hamburg, Florence V. Pyle of Lower Heidelberg Township, Luke M. Synder and Maude A. Davis of Ontelaunee Township and Edna Noll Moyer of Ruscombmanor have faithfully served the people of Berks County, Pa. These outstanding individuals are deeply respected and admired by all who are privileged to know them.

On April 28, the Berks County Democratic Committee will be honoring these fine committee persons for their public service. These committee people have devoted their precious time and endless energy to involving the community in our democratic process. In addition to their work with the Democratic Party they are all fine examples of civic mindedness and outstanding citizenship. They are outstanding members of their communities and they represent the essence of our electoral process.

I know that my colleagues will join me in paying tribute to these six fine Americans. It is indeed my honor to recognize the accomplishments of Sallie I. Pawling, Mamie L. Hartman, Florence V. Pyle, Luke M. Snyder, Maude A. Davis, and Edna Noll Moyer. I want to congratulate all of them on a job exceedingly well done.●

THE 2-PERCENT SOLUTION

HON. THOMAS A. DASCHLE

OF SOUTH DAKOTA

Thursday, April 5, 1984

● Mr. DASCHLE. Mr. Speaker, yesterday I approached the discussion on the amendment offered by my colleague from Louisiana with truly mixed emotions. I have long advocated, and am a cosponsor of legislation calling for, the 2-percent solution concept embodied in this budget substitute. I agree with my colleagues who are supporting this approach that getting a handle on entitlements is a necessary step, and one that we must take if we are ever to get the unacceptable budget deficits we are facing under control.

But equal to that commitment is my commitment that the budget deficit reduction we pass here be, as far as humanly and legislatively possible, a fair one. Unfortunately, it is my perception that the substitute before us fails that test. Had the sponsors of this legislation provided a true, across the board freeze on all spending, while at the same time embodying the concepts of the 2-percent solution to both nonmeans tested entitlement programs and the indexation of income taxes, I might well have supported it. In that way, the sacrifices that our retirees are asked to make under this plan, and that our wage earners are asked to make, would have been balanced by an equivalency of sacrifice across the board.

However, the substitute does not do this. While making real cuts in social security and other Federal retirement programs, and freezing spending on most discretionary programs, the substitute at the same time provides for a real growth rate, after inflation, of 5 percent in the defense budget, in each of the 3 covered years. In other words, what this substitute does is ask our senior citizens to give up some of their fixed retirement income, and our wage earners to give up some of the tax relief that they would gain from indexing, to finance additional budget authority of $91.2 billion in defense spending over the next 3 years.

In effect, this calls on the W-2 filer, and the retiree, to continue to support the Pentagon's habit of paying over $400 for ordinary hardware store hammers. To me, this is an unconscionable distortion of priorities which I simply cannot support.

I remain committed to the principal of the 2-percent solution, and will work in the future to see that it is included in a comprehensive budget reform package which treats all spending equally. I cannot, however, support it in the context of using the dollars taken away from our retirees and wage earners to finance more wasteful Pentagon shopping sprees.●

IRANIAN LAWYERS PERSECUTED DUE TO BAHA'I FAITH

HON. BARNEY FRANK

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 5, 1984

● Mr. FRANK. Mr. Speaker, I have previously presented to the House Material about the plight of the Baha'i community in Iran, which is being persecuted by the Khomeini regime. It is government policy in Iran that the practice of the Baha'i religion is to be regarded as a conspiracy against the State, and as a result more than 150 Baha'is have been executed, and many others have disappeared, been tortured, lost their jobs, had their property confiscated, had their children expelled from school, and otherwise been harassed and humiliated. I would urge my colleagues who have not already done so to cosponsor House Concurrent Resolution 226, introduced by my colleague Mr. PORTER of Illinois, expressing the sense of Congress regarding the persecution of this community. I would also like to voice my appreciation to the administration, which has on many occasion spoken out on this matter and kept the outrageous practices of the Iranian Government in the public eye.

I would also like, Mr. Speaker, to bring to the attention of this body the superb work which is done by the American Bar Association on this and other human rights matters. The ABA has set up a network of concerned correspondents, which keeps an eye on human rights violations around the world and alerts its members so that they may voice their protests in the most effective way possible. They have recently alerted their membership to the situation confronting the Baha'i. In addition to the more obvious suggestions as to who to address letters of concern to, the appeal includes the helpful suggestion that members contact the Japanese Ambassador to the United States (Japan is Iran's most important trading partner) and to the Ambassador of Zambia to the United States (Zambian President Kenneth Kaunda has contacts with the Iranian Government).

Mr. Speaker, I commend the excellent job the ABA is doing in the human rights field; it is proof of the seriousness and commitment it has to the rule of law. I ask that its appeal on behalf of Iran's Baha'is be made part of the RECORD.

IRANIAN LAWYERS PERSECUTED DUE TO BAHA'I FAITH

The National Spiritual Assembly of the Baha'is of the United States reports the continuing systematic persecution of the Baha'i community in Iran, including specific actions directed against lawyers affiliated with the Baha'is. A number of lawyers have been disbarred by having their licenses revoked. Specifically, the Islamic Revolutionary Court of Tehran on September 4, 1983 revoked the licenses of a number of justice ministry lawyers on the grounds that they had links to the Baha'i community (see attached press statement). One of those disbarred, Badiullah Farid, had been executed in Tehran on June 24, 1981. Another, Manuher Ghaemmaghami, was kindnapped by the government authorities in August 1980.

Due to the public nature of their work—particularly the necessity that they deal with government authorities, including the police—Baha'i lawyers are prime targets for discrimination and violence directed against Baha'is generally. The situation of the Baha'i community in Iran is described in the Department of State Country Reports on Human Rights Practices for 1983. The situation of the Baha'is is worsening. In the first three weeks of November 1983, 140 Baha'is were arrested by government authorities, and one Baha'i was lynched by a mob in Azerbaijan province. See also attached bulletin update and article.

RECOMMENDED ACTION

The voice of American lawyers may carry great weight in other nations whose efforts to influence the Iranians might be more effective than those of the U.S. Government at this time. Individuals are encouraged to write to the following governments, expressing their concern about the situation of Baha'i lawyers in Iran and the Baha'i community, generally, and in particular—requesting information about the disbarment of lawyers with links to the Baha'i community; and—expressing concern about the continued oppression of Baha'is, including lawyers.●

INTERNATIONAL VENTRILOQUIST'S WEEK

HON. ROMANO L. MAZZOLI

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 5, 1984

● Mr. MAZZOLI. Mr. Speaker, today I introduced a resolution to designate the week of July 1-July 7 as "International Ventriloquist's Week."

Ventriloquism is an art form which traces its origins back some 3,000 years. And, while originally associated with magic, ventriloquism has emerged as an art form which has been entertaining and fascinating audiences for years.

The Vent Haven Museum in Fort Mitchell, Ky., houses the most complete collection of ventriloquial items from around the world. And, each year in Fort Mitchell, ventriloquists from everywhere gather for their annual convention. It was in Kentucky at Fort Mitchell that the International Brotherhood of Ventriloquists was founded. It claims today over 1,000 members worldwide.

Ventriloquists have always been among the more generous of performers and entertainers in devoting their time and skill to entertain and divert patients—especially the little boys and girls—at hospitals, orphanages, and other institutions.

I hope my colleagues will join me in supporting this measure to recognize and draw attention to ventriloquism and to see some of the great ventriloquists—such as Edgar Bergen, Shari Lewis, Paul Winchell, and Burr Tilstrom—who have shared their special talent with so many through the years.●

CHRISTOPHER RESIDENCE ANNIVERSARY

HON. RAYMOND J. McGRATH
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 5, 1984

● Mr. McGRATH. Mr. Speaker, on April 7 the Christopher Residence in my hometown of Valley Stream, N.Y., will be holding an anniversary party, marking its 10th anniversary in the community.

The story of the Christopher Residence, a home for retarded adults, is a touching one. It is the story of a community overcoming fear and uncertainty and opening its mind and its heart to others.

I will not dwell on the details, but the basic story of the Christopher Residence is as follows:

Early in 1973, Father Robert Emmet Fagan, director of Catholic Charities of Rockville Centre, approached the parish council of Valley Stream with a plan to open a home for retarded adults. In 1974, the parish council approved the plan.

What followed was not particularly pleasant. Residents of the community were strongly opposed to the residence, fearing for the neighborhood and the safety of its children. They fought the opening of the residence with every means at their disposal, but it opened anyway.

But the story has a happy ending, thanks to some very special people. Appointed as supervisors of the house were Sisters Kate McGrath and Catherine O'Shea, Dominican nuns who had worked at a successful residence in Brooklyn. They went to great lengths to teach the local residents about mental retardation and the needs and aspirations of those who would be living in the house. They tried to be reassuring and to let the residents of the community see that they had nothing to fear. They had faith and they were persistent, and in not too long a time their faith was rewarded.

Today, the Christopher Residence is a part of the Valley Stream community, and the people of the community have opened their hearts to the residents of the house. The faith of Sisters Kate McGrath and Catherine O'Shea in the basic goodness of man toward his fellow man has been rewarded, and the result is something of which the Valley Stream community can be proud.●

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES—Monday, April 9, 1984

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James David Ford, D.D., offered the following prayer:

O God, the heavens display Your glory and Your marvelous creation is seen in the order and beauty of our world. Grant, O God, that Your works may also be seen in our lives—in deeds of justice, in acts of kindness, in words of comfort, and in lives of service. May we see Your commandments of love as our invitation to be stewards of goodness and grace this day and every day. Amen.

REMOVING THE UNITED STATES FROM JURISDICTION OF INTERNATIONAL COURT OF JUSTICE

(Mr. GIBBONS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. GIBBONS. Mr. Speaker, over the weekend you have effectively disposed of the President's attempt to rewrite the history of Beirut and his involvement therein and that mistake.

But one serious thing remains. That is the attempt of the President to take the United States out of the jurisdiction of the International Court of Justice. This is a terrible mistake.

I hope the appropriate committees of the House and of the other body will investigate this thoroughly and make the appropriate recommendations to this body for appropriate action.

THE PRESIDENT IS INCONSISTENT ON CHEMICAL WEAPONS

(Mr. RATCHFORD asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. RATCHFORD. Mr. Speaker, the issue of chemical warfare is a very sensitive one, yet the President sent the world mixed signals in his press conference last week.

At the same time that the President called for the United States to lead an effort to obtain an international treaty to ban chemical weapons, he urged Congress to approve more spending for the deadly gas. Nothing could be more inconsistent.

Mr. Speaker, I agree that the United States should be a leader in the worldwide effort to ban chemical weaponry. But I do not believe that building more of these horrible weapons will lead to the elimination of their use.

Instead, I think we in the House of Representatives can best share the President's admirable goal by loudly and clearly saying no to his expensive and insensitive request for funds to add to our chemical weapons stockpile.

REAGAN ADMINISTRATION FEARS JUDGMENT OF WORLD COURT

(Mr. BARNES asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. BARNES. Mr. Speaker, many of us have known for some time that the Reagan administration's Central American policies could not stand the light of day. Now the administration has admitted as much. By refusing to accept the jurisdiction of the International Court of Justice over the CIA's mining of Nicaraguan ports, the administration has demonstrated that it knows that its policies could not withstand an inquiry by impartial, objective international bodies.

This does not just affect the mining of the ports. The administration says that it will not accept the Court's jurisdiction over any of its actions in Central America for the next 2 years. Clearly, this would cover the introduction of U.S. combat troops, for which the New York Times reported yesterday we are beginning contingency planning.

Mr. Speaker, I am shocked that the President of the United States shows so little respect for international law. I am shocked that the Reagan administration so casually undermines the very international institutions that we did so much to set up for the purpose of protecting small countries from powerful ones. The American people are becoming shocked, too, and they are going to expect the House to do something about this outlaw behavior when we vote again on aid for so-called covert action later this week.

The Subcommittee on Western Hemisphere Affairs, which I have the honor to chair, plans immediate hearings on this shameful episode.

FOREIGN POLICY DISARRAY

(Mr. RICHARDSON asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, the administration's foreign policy is in complete disarray and the President is blaming all of his failure on the Congress, especially Lebanon.

So what is next?

Our relations with the Soviet Union are in disarray. Is it our fault that Mr. Reagan is the first American President not to have a summit meeting in his past 3½ years of being in office?

Is it our fault that there are no arms control negotiations?

Is it our fault that we are supporting a regime in the Philippines that is corrupt and may be toppled; a regime that is on the side of repression of human rights? America has vital security interests in the Philippines, and they are being jeopardized by the unstable situation there.

Is it our fault that the next President of El Salvador may be the leader of the El Salvadoran death squads? And when the Congress is reluctant to fund this regime, will it be our fault if something goes wrong in Central America?

Mr. Speaker, the President is in effect saying that all Members of the Congress, Republican and Democrat, should stay out of foreign policy. In effect what he is saying is that the American people through their Representatives should just lie back and let him make all decisions. This is not only wrong and unconscionable, but unconstitutional and illegal as well.

PERMISSION FOR COMMITTEE ON RULES TO FILE PRIVILEGED REPORTS ON RULE ON H.R. 7, CHILD NUTRITION ACT OF 1963 EXTENSION, AND RULE ON CONFERENCE REPORT ON S. 1852, DEFENSE PRODUCTION ACT OF 1950 EXTENSION

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Rules may have until midnight tonight, April 9, 1984, to file two privileged reports: First, granting a rule on H.R. 7, to extend and improve the Child Nutrition Act of 1963; and second, granting a rule on the conference report on S. 1852, to extend the Defense Production Act of 1950.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Louisiana?

There was no objection.

REQUEST FOR PERMISSION FOR COMMITTEE ON WAYS AND MEANS TO FILE REPORT ON H.R. 5362

Mr. MILLER of California. Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Ways and Means may have until 6 p.m. tonight, Monday, April 9, 1984, to file its report to accompany the bill, H.R. 5362.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

Mr. WORTLEY. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would ask the gentleman: Has this been cleared with the minority?

Mr. MILLER of California. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WORTLEY. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. MILLER of California. It is my understanding that it has been.

Mr. WORTLEY. It is my understanding that it has not been cleared. I would ask the gentleman to withhold his request.

Mr. SPEAKER. Will the gentleman withhold his request?

Mr. MILLER of California. I will withhold the request, Mr. Speaker.

ENGAGING IN STATE SPONSORED ACTS OF TERRORISM

(Mr. MILLER of California asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute, and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. MILLER of California. Mr. Speaker, last year the House of Representatives voted to cut off money to support the covert war in Nicaragua. Unfortunately, the Senate did not concur in that decision, and that war now continues and continues to widen.

Unfortunately, now we have learned that the Reagan administration has made a decision to engage in state-sponsored terrorism. The mining of the harbors of Nicaragua have resulted in the random damage of our allies' ships and injury to members of their merchant marine. This most recent act of terrorism follows on the heels of aerial bombings of suburban neighborhoods of Managua.

The question for the Congress over the next few days is whether or not we will ratify these acts by continuing the funding of the program that sponsors them, or whether we will cut off the funds for the covert war. I am sure that when the President asked for bipartisan support for his foreign policy, his plea did not extend to support for the state-sponsored terrorism that the Reagan administration is now practicing against the people of Nicaragua, terrorism that has received the universal condemnation of our allies.

CENTRAL AMERICAN POLICY BORDERS ON SHEER LUNACY

(Mr. BEDELL asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. BEDELL. Mr. Speaker, the not so secret war in Central America is once again on the front pages of our Nation's newspapers, as we are now informed that part of our covert operations against the Sandinista government include direct CIA supervision of the mining of Nicaraguan ports. Further, we are informed that the administration will not accept World Court jurisdiction in disputes involving Central America for 2 years.

These elements of President Reagan's Central American policy border on sheer lunacy. The mining of harbors is an act of war. Does the President realize or accept the responsibility for such actions? Is the President attempting to engineer a United States-Nicaraguan showdown or worse yet, a United States-Soviet showdown in Central America? Have we, in the Congress, had ample opportunity to discuss the very real risks to our national security and leadership of the Western alliance that are posed by these actions?

Clearly, something must be done before the situation there gets out of hand. For this reason, I believe it essential for the Congress to once again and as soon as possible debate this issue. Perhaps, we shall have to do this in a secret session but do it we must. We are a nation of laws but today, we have an administration that seems to believe it does not have to adhere to domestic or international law in the conduct of its foreign policies. As lawmakers, we bear the ultimate responsibility for reigning in this administration and the sooner the better.

WE SHOULD HAVE DEEPER BUDGET DEFICIT CUTS

(Mr. LEVITAS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. LEVITAS. Mr. Speaker, the headline on the lead editorial in the Washington Post this morning said, "Better Than Nothing" referring to the action taken by the House of Representatives on the budget last week. Perhaps the Washington Post was overly generous in their praise. The financial markets have already indicated what they think about the inadequate deficit cutting and that response was to see interest rates go up again because of the enormous deficits and the inadequate House action.

The fact of the matter is that the President and the Republicans do not take this matter seriously. The original Presidential budget and the Republican-Rose Garden budget did not do enough. The Democratic leadership and our Budget Committee came out with a better document than the Republican budget, but it could have been so much better if some of our Members who are budget experts and who work on the Budget Committee had not lost their nerve and if they had taken some drastic action to really reduce this budget deficit. Our leadership should have given us a fairer and better rule that would have permitted procedures to have a deeper budget deficit reduction, deeper spending cuts and real, meaningful pay-as-you-go amendments.

We need a budget with a dramatically lower deficit. That is what the people of America are looking for, and that is what the financial markets are looking for. That is what we need to be saying on Main Street and saying to Wall Street.

I hope that when we see a conference report on the budget, it will be with a deeper deficit reduction and a much more effective budget that will bring interest rates down.

MINING OF NICARAGUAN WATERS, AN ACT OF INTERNATIONAL AGGRESSION

(Mr. MATSUI asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. MATSUI. Mr. Speaker, it appears that this administration's foreign policy has become so morally bankrupt that it must forewarn the World Court that it cannot accept their judgment on U.S. actions in Central America. That is a sad state of affairs, Mr. Speaker. Especially when one considers that the mining of the Nicaraguan waters deserves to be condemned as an act of international aggression.

The President wants Congress to stop meddling in foreign affairs, but I say to the President, "Stop meddling with the very principles on which this country's foreign policy should be based—international peace and self-determination for all peoples."

Finally Mr. Speaker, the tragic irony is that our Central American policy is only playing into the hands of the Marxist regime whose form of government we so absolutely abhor. Let us stop providing the Marxists with propaganda bonanzas and start getting on with the business of negotiations.

CONGRESS SHOULD IMMEDIATELY END ALL FUNDING FOR ILLEGAL ADVENTURE IN NICARAGUA

(Mr. KOSTMAYER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. KOSTMAYER. Mr. Speaker, this administration's contempt for the role of Congress and the rule of international law has brought the conduct of American foreign policy to lows not reached since Vietnam.

No one questions the right of the President to make policy, but his suggestion that the debate ends there amounts to one-man rule and a claim of infallability.

And now the President's blatant partisan attempt to blame Congress for his mistakes only adds insult to injury.

Contrary to the President's pronouncements, Congress should immediately end all funding for his illegal adventure in Nicaragua, before the mining of harbors escalates to the deployment of American forces.

The President formulates, but the Congress appropriates. Cut him off now.

OPPOSE THE "TEMPORARY SUSPENSION" OF INTERNATIONAL LAW

(Mr. LOWRY of Washington asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. LOWRY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to express my strong opposition to the Reagan administration's decision to refuse to accept international legal jurisdiction over our actions in Central America during the next 2 years.

Recently President Reagan called for a bipartisan foreign policy. We then learned of the direct CIA involvement in the mining of Nicaragua's ports. Our ally, Great Britain, has protested this CIA action. France has offered to help clear the mines away. We vetoed a Security Council resolution protesting outside military intervention in Nicaragua, including the mining of the harbors.

Now the administration has notified the U.N. Secretary General of a temporary and limited modification of our acceptance of compulsory jurisdiction of the International Court of Justice in disputes "with any Central American state" or "any dispute arising out of or related to events in Central America" in the next 2 years. Administration officials have said that the purpose is to avoid a propaganda spectacular by Nicaragua.

This action flies in the face of a call for bipartisanship. The bipartisan foreign policy tradition started because Franklin Roosevelt wanted to avoid a repetition of what happened at the end of World War I, when the Senate rejected the Treaty of Versailles and kept us out of the League of Nations. It started because Democrats and Republicans worked together in support of the United Nations as a mechanism for world peace. In 1946, as the bipartisan foreign policy concept was taking root, we recognized the jurisdiction of the World Court in international disputes.

It is a sad day in our history when an American administration decides to step away from that 1946 action. I believe that bipartisanship in foreign policy can only succeed when our foreign policy embodies our ideals. And what does the United States stand for above all? It is that the rule of law must be supreme. You do not suspend the rule of law for 2 days or 2 weeks, much less 2 years.

In 1946, we accepted that the rule of law should apply in international disputes. Now we are stepping away from that attempt to extend our ideals to the rest of the world. It is a sad, cynical thing for the United States to back down from its ideals. I hope Members of both parties will protest this action.

RAILROAD UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

(Mr. PICKLE asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. PICKLE. Mr. Speaker, I take this opportunity to alert my colleagues to the recent failure of the Railroad Unemployment Compensation Committee to make the full and timely report required by law.

As you know, last summer the Congress took the steps necessary to put the railroad retirement system on firm financing footing.

The Committee on Ways and Means sought to accommodate the legitimate concerns that both management and labor had. The committee statutorily required that labor and management sit down with an independent third party and report back to Congress with recommendations of how to resolve their problems and required a report be delivered to the Congress no later than April 1, 1984.

I was disappointed to learn last week that this Commission did not meet the statutory deadline for its report and recommendations. Rather the Commission issued an interim report which was largely a review of the history of the railroad unemployment system and had no more substance than a bowl of warm jello.

My intention at this time is to serve notice that this report is inadequate and completely unsatisfactory.

It is my understanding that the administration is now completing the details of its own recommendations which will soon be submitted to the Congress. It is also my understanding that Congressman FORD, chairman of the Ways and Means Subcommittee with jurisdiction over unemployment compensation intends to hold hearings on the administration's proposal. I heartily applaud Chairman FORD for showing leadership on this issue.

I strongly believe that management and labor should live up to their commitment of last year and also follow the law. If they cannot act in a timely manner then Congress must.

HOUSE SHOULD STAND FIRM IN ITS REFUSAL TO FINANCE SECRET WAR

(Mr. SEIBERLING asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Speaker, the action of this administration in violating international law by mining Nicaragua's harbors and then announcing that it will not recognize or accept the jurisdiction of the World Court on any issue relating to Central America reduces our Nation to the level of an international scofflaw.

Most Americans will, as I do, feel ashamed that the Nation that was founded on the very principle of the rule of law, and that has led the debate within the world community for respect for international law, would now stand before the world and thumb its nose at those very principles.

The action this administration has taken today will not succeed in its goals of escaping responsibility for the mining of Nicaragua's harbors. Nor will it succeed in tempering the anger of our allies to our policy toward Nicaragua.

Rather, this action will simply reduce our own credibility in the eyes of the law and in the eyes of the international community.

We must repudiate the decision of the administration. But to the international community and to all those who continue to believe in the rule of law, I hold out hope that the House of Representatives will represent our Nation's principles, and, perhaps as early as this week, will stand firm in its refusal to finance the secret war. It has become clear that the secret war is undermining our own principles more than it is undermining the strength of the Sandinistas.

THE NEED FOR BIPARTISANSHIP IN FOREIGN POLICY

(Mr. BROOMFIELD asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I commend the President for the remarks he made last week when he talked about the need for bipartisanship in foreign policy.

Tearing down American foreign policy has somehow become a virtue in this election year.

Unfortunately, we will all have to live amid the wreckage after the election is over.

National candidates who should know better are playing isolationist one-upsmanship with each other, and our foreign policy will be the loser.

It is one thing to offer constructive criticism while policy is being formulated.

It is another to criticize on the run, escalating every debate for the ultimate partisan gain, and rushing to judgment to see who will be first to pull the plug on America's interests whether in Central America or the Middle East.

Mr. Speaker, it is time the candidates pull the plug on this irresponsible rhetoric. We owe it to ourselves to weigh what we say carefully against the damage it can do to America's long-range interests.

THE FIX IS IN

(Mr. DANNEMEYER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. DANNEMEYER. Mr. Speaker, the congressional budget process is looking more and more like the World Series of 1919, when the fix was in. This week the House will consider spending cuts for 1985. The problem is we have no bill. The problem is that no committee will get to lay a glove on the reconciliation horsehide.

The Congress is going the World Series of 1919 one better—we are not even going to hold the game. We are just going to announce results.

Is that not great? No bill. No committee consideration. Just a spitball over homeplate with no batter. But we do have an umpire—the American people. We have got a deficit that keeps growing, but no players in the budget process. All we have are the team owners, the Democratic leadership, making up the rules as they go along.

DRIVING A STAKE INTO THE HEART OF THE RULE OF LAW

(Mr. LEACH of Iowa asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. LEACH of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, to read over the weekend that the administration has unilaterally decided that for the next 2 years any dispute related to events in Central America will not be subject to the jurisdiction of the World Court is dismaying to all concerned for the rule of law.

For decades there has been debate about whether the United States should play the role of policeman for the world, with some arguing that it is a chore for which we lack either a legal imprimatur or adequate resources to undertake. But a new dimension to this debate is implicit in the administration's recent assertions about Central America. Not only are the President's advisers suggesting that we will actively play the role of world policeman, but they are now arguing that rather than enforcing the law, the interventionist cops we are funding in Central America are themselves above the law.

The most fundamental issues of world politics today are, in the first instance, how we contain and constrain weapons of mass destruction, and in the second, how we can best advance the rule of law. To refuse to submit disputes to the World Court and abide by arbitration decisions of that body is to drive a stake into the heart of the rule of law.

Any given foreign policy is always controversial, but seldom have our ideals themselves been so thoroughly brought into question.

CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENTS

(Mr. HUNTER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. HUNTER. Mr. Speaker, at this time I would hope to offer a unanimous-consent request calling for consideration of amendments to permit voluntary school prayer, balanced budget, and line-item veto.

The Chair has ruled that in order to make these requests I must have the clearance of the majority and minority leaderships and the request has been cleared by the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. MICHEL), the Republican leader.

I would now yield to a spokesman from the majority leadership for appropriate clearance.

Mr. Speaker, I hear no response and that should make it clear to the American people who stands in the way of these three important issues—the Democratic leadership of this House.

A TRIBUTE TO THE LATE SENATOR FRANK CHURCH

(Mr. CRAIG asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. CRAIG. Mr. Speaker, this past weekend, former Idaho Senator Frank Church passed away after a long illness. He served the State of Idaho and the Nation for 24 years in the U.S. Senate.

It would be inappropriate for me to extol the political stewardship of Senator Church because we held few philosophical beliefs in common. Even so, I, Idaho, and the Nation mourn his passing because he was a man and a political leader of deep commitment and a sincere, personal resolve to pursuing policies he felt were in the best interest of this Nation.

He was a man of unique ability who established a lofty goal in his political life of becoming chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee and achieved it; who believed strongly about the conduct of American foreign policy and courageously fought for those beliefs despite the political consequences. One need not agree with those positions to admire and respect that integrity and honesty.

Many Members of Congress will come and go, but few will carve out of their tenures a place in history. Those that do, usually have done so out of their strength of commitment and statesmanship. The passing of Frank Church is the passing of one of those men.

The greatest strength of the American political experiment is the tolerance, integrity, and intensity of its deliberative process, where men and women of divergent positions seek to implement policies that will steer the country toward a peaceful, prosperous, and free future. Positions on the specific issues at the time defines the politician participants in that process, but history and force of personal commitment to the process define statesmen.

This weekend, the Nation lost a statesman. And whether you agreed or disagreed with the late Senator Church's political positions, he carried those beliefs to the deliberative process with that strength of character.

I join with others in extending my condolences to the Church family.

REPORT ON RESOLUTION DIRECTING SECRETARY OF STATE TO PROVIDE INFORMATION CONCERNING SLAYING OF AMERICAN CHURCHWOMEN IN EL SALVADOR

Mr. KOSTMAYER, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, submitted a privileged report (Rept. No. 98-657) on the resolution (H. Res. 464) directing the Secretary of State to provide certain information to the House of Representatives concerning the 1980 slayings of four American churchwomen in El Salvador, which was referred to the House Calendar and ordered to be printed.

REPORT ON RESOLUTION DIRECTING SECRETARY OF STATE TO PROVIDE INFORMATION CONCERNING DEATH SQUADS IN EL SALVADOR

Mr. KOSTMAYER, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, submitted a privileged report (Rept. No. 98-658) on the resolution (H. Res. 463) directing the Secretary of State to provide certain information to the House of Representatives concerning death squads in El Salvador, which was referred to the House Calendar and ordered to be printed.

MEMORIAL SERVICE TO BE HELD FOR SENATOR FRANK CHURCH

(Mr. WRIGHT asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I should like to announce for all who may wish to attend that a memorial service will be held at 11 o'clock tomorrow morning at the Washington National Cathedral in honor of the late Senator Frank Church. Frank Church's example combined the starkly independent judgments of an honest man with the warm, outgoing good will of an inherently kind human being.

At a time when there are disagreements, candid and profound, on international issues, it may be that we can draw from his inspiration to create a few basic principles which will allow us to be more bipartisan in our spirits if not always in our judgments and, when we disagree, to do so with sufficient grace that we shall not be disagreeable.

Those who would join in honoring the memory of Frank Church are invited to attend the observance in the cathedral at 11 o'clock tomorrow.

PERMISSION FOR COMMITTEE ON WAYS AND MEANS TO FILE REPORT ON H.R. 5362

Mr. MILLER of California. Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Ways and Means have until 6 p.m. tonight, Monday, April 9, 1984, to file its report to accompany the bill, H.R. 5362.

Mr. Speaker, it is my understanding that this has been cleared with the minority members of the committee.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

Mr. WORTLEY. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, there is no objection. We have received assurances that the cost estimates to accompany the bill, prepared by the Congressional Budget Office, will be included in that report and, therefore, we have no objection.

Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

TITLE I—DECLARATION OF FINDINGS, PURPOSES, AND POLICIES

FINDINGS

SEC. 101. The Congress finds and declares that—

(1) the continuous civilian collection and utilization of land remote-sensing data from space is of major benefit in managing the Earth's natural resources and in planning or conducting many other activities of economic importance;

(2) the national interest of the United States lies in maintaining international leadership in civil remote-sensing and in broadly promoting the beneficial use of remote-sensing data;

(3) land remote-sensing by the Government or private parties of the United States affects international commitments and policies and national security concerns of the United States;

(4) the broadest and most beneficial use of land remote-sensing data is likely to result from maintaining a policy of nondiscriminatory access to data;

(5) use of land remote-sensing data has been inhibited by slow market development and by the lack of assurance of data continuity;

(6) the private sector, and in particular the "value-added" industry, is best suited to develop land remote-sensing data markets;

(7) vigorous, competitive, market-driven private sector involvement in land remote-sensing can lead to rapid realization of the potential benefits of that technology;

(8) to utilize fully the strengths of the private sector, any process of commercialization of land remote-sensing should involve the maximum practicable competition and the minimum (both in duration and amount) practicable Government subsidy;

(9) at the present time, it is unclear that the private sector alone will develop a total land remote-sensing system because of the high risk and large capital expenditures involved;

(10) cooperation between the Federal Government and the private sector can help assure both data continuity and United States leadership;

(11) the time is now appropriate to initiate such cooperation with phased transition to a fully commercial system;

(12) cooperation between Government and the private sector in civil land remote-sensing should be structured so as to minimize

Government direction and regulation and maximize private sector involvement;

(13) nevertheless, certain Government oversight must be maintained to assure that private sector activities are in the national interest and that the international commitments and policies of the United States are honored; and

(14) there is no compelling reason to commercialize meteorological satellites at this time.

PURPOSES

SEC. 102. It is therefore the purpose of this Act—

(1) to guide the United States Government in promoting full, prompt, and proper involvement of the private sector in civil land remote-sensing from space;

(2) to maintain the United States leading position in civil remote-sensing, preserve its national security, and fulfill its international obligations;

(3) to prescribe conditions for assuring continuity of civil land remote-sensing data while protecting public and private nondiscriminatory access to these data;

(4) to minimize the duration and amount of any further Federal investment that might be necessary to achieve full commercialization of civil land remote-sensing; and

(5) to prohibit commercialization of meteorological satellites at this time.

POLICIES

SEC. 103. (a) It shall be the policy of the United States to preserve its right to acquire and disseminate digital remote-sensing data.

(b) It shall be the policy of the United States that civilian digital remote-sensing data be made available to all potential users on a nondiscriminatory basis.

(c) It shall be the policy of the United States both to commercialize those space remote-sensing functions that properly lend themselves to private sector operation and to avoid competition by the Government with such commercial operations, while continuing to preserve our national security, to honor our international obligations, and to retain in the Government those remote-sensing functions that are essentially of a public service nature.

DEFINITIONS

SEC. 104. For purposes of this Act:

(1) The term "digital remote-sensing data" means the unprocessed and minimally processed signals collected from civil remote-sensing space systems or original film products collected from such systems. Such minimal processing shall be limited to rectification of instrumental distortions, registration with respect to features on the Earth, and calibration of spectral response. Such term does not include conclusions, manipulations, or calculations derived from such signals or combination of the signals with other data or information. Unless otherwise limited, digital remote-sensing data includes land and ocean sensed data.

(2) The term "Secretary" means the Secretary of Commerce.

(3)(A) The term "on a nondiscriminatory basis" means without preference, bias, or any other special arrangement regarding delivery, format, financing, or technical considerations which would favor one buyer or class of buyers over another.

(B) The sale of data is made on a nondiscriminatory basis only if (i) any offer to sell or deliver data is published in advance in such manner as will ensure that the offer is equally available to all prospective buyers; (ii) the system operator has not established or changed any price, policy, procedure, or other term or condition in a manner which gives one buyer or class of buyer de facto favored access to data; and (iii) in a case where a system operator offers volume discounts, such discounts are no greater than the demonstrable reductions in the cost of such sales. The sale of data on a nondiscriminatory basis does not preclude the system operator offering discounts other than volume discounts to the extent that such discounts are not inconsistent with any other provision of this paragraph.

(C) The sale of data on a nondiscriminatory basis does not require (i) that a system operator disclose names of buyers or their purchases; (ii) that a system operator maintain all, or any particular subset of, data in a working inventory; or (iii) that a system operator expend equal effort in developing all segments of a market.

(4) The term "Landsat system" means Landsat 1, 2, 3, 4, and 5, and related ground equipment, systems, and facilities, and any successor civil land remote-sensing satellites operated by the United States Government prior to the commencement of the six-year period described in section 302(b)(2).

(5) The term "system operator" means a contractor under title II or a license holder under title IV.

TITLE II—CONTRACT FOR EXISTING LAND REMOTE-SENSING SATELLITE SYSTEM

CONTRACT REQUIREMENTS

SEC. 201. (a) In accordance with the requirements of this Act, the Secretary shall, subject to the availability of appropriations therefor, contract with a United States private sector party (as defined by the Secretary) to market digital remote-sensing data generated by the Landsat system. If the Secretary determines that competition for such contract will promote the policies and purposes of this Act, the Secretary may accept proposals for such contract which include the operation by such United States private sector party of (1) the space component of the Landsat system, (2) the related ground equipment, systems, and facilities, or (3) both such space component and such related equipment, systems, and facilities.

(b) A contract awarded under subsection (a) shall be awarded, after competition, in accordance with the conditions of section 203. Such contract may be reawarded competitively after the practical demise of the space segment of the Landsat system, as determined by the Secretary.

(c) Any contract authorized by subsection (a)—

(1) shall not permit the transfer to any contractor of title to any part or all of the Landsat system; and

(2) may specify that the contractor use, and, at his own expense, maintain, repair, or modify elements of the Landsat system as the contractor finds necessary for commercial operations.

(d) If, as a result of the competitive process required by subsection (b), the Secretary receives no proposal which he finds acceptable under the conditions of this Act, the Secretary shall so certify and fully report his findings to the Congress. Thirty days after so certifying and reporting, the Secretary may reopen the competition. If no acceptable proposals are received after such subsequent competition, or if the Secretary decides not to reopen the competition, the Secretary shall so certify and fully report his findings to the Congress. In the event that no acceptable proposal is received, the Secretary shall continue to operate the Landsat system and to market data from such system.

(e) In defining "United States private sector party" for purposes of subsection (a), the Secretary may take into account the citizenship of key personnel, location of assets, foreign ownership, control, and influence, and other such factors.

SALE OF DATA

SEC. 202. (a) The United States Government shall retain title to any and all data generated by the Landsat system. However, after the date of the commencement of the contract described in section 201(a), the contractor shall be entitled to revenues from sales of copies of data from the Landsat system, subject to the conditions specified in sections 601 and 602 of this Act.

(b) The contractor may continue to market data previously generated by the Landsat system after the demise of the space segment of that system.

CONDITIONS OF COMPETITION FOR CONTRACT

SEC. 203. (a) The Secretary of Commerce shall, as part of his advertisement for the competition for the contract authorized by section 201, identify and publish the international obligations, national security concerns (with appropriate protection of sensitive information), domestic legal considerations, and any other standards or conditions which a private contractor shall be required to meet.

(b) In selecting a contractor under this title, the Secretary shall consider—

(1) ability to market aggressively digital remote-sensing data;

(2) the best overall financial return to the Government, including the potential savings to the Government;

(3) ability to meet the obligations, concerns, standards, and conditions identified under subsection (a);

(4) technical competence, including the ability to assure continuity and timeliness of data from the Landsat system;

(5) absence of any conflicts of interest which could inhibit nondiscriminatory access to such data;

(6) ability to effect a smooth transition with the contractor selected under title III of this Act; and

(7) such other factors as he deems appropriate.

FOREIGN GROUND STATIONS

SEC. 204. (a) The contract under this title shall provide that the contractor shall act as the agent of the Secretary by continuing to supply digital remote-sensing data to foreign ground stations for the life, and according to their terms, of those agreements between the United States Government and such foreign ground stations that are in force on the date of the commencement of the contract.

(b) Upon the expiration of such agreements, or in the case of foreign ground stations that have no agreement with the United States on the date of commencement of the contract, the contract shall provide—

(1) that digital remote-sensing data from the Landsat system shall be made available to foreign ground stations only by the contractor; and

(2) that such data shall be made available on a nondiscriminatory basis.

TITLE III—PROVISION OF DATA CONTINUITY DURING TRANSITION PERIOD

PURPOSES AND DEFINITIONS

SEC. 301. (a) It is the purpose of this title—

(1) to provide, in an orderly manner and with minimal risk, for a transition between Government operation and private, commercial operation of civil land remote-sensing space systems; and

(2) to provide for the continuity of MSS data for six years after the practical demise of the space segment of the Landsat system.

(b) For purposes of this title—

(1) the term "Multi-Spectral Scanner" means the instrument referred to by that name and carried on the Landsat 4 and Landsat 5 satellites; and

(2) the term "MSS data" means digital remote-sensing data which, from the point of view of a data user, are—

(A) functionally equivalent to data from the Multi-Spectral Scanner; and

(B) compatible with data and with equipment used to receive and process data from such Scanner.

CONTRACT FOR DATA AVAILABILITY AND CONTINUITY

SEC. 302. (a) Subject to the availability of appropriations therefor and to the licensing conditions established under title IV, the Secretary shall, after competition, contract with a United States private sector party (as defined by the Secretary pursuant to section 201) for the provision by such party of the capability of generating data of a quality at least equal to the quality of MSS data and of selling and delivering such data to the Federal Government. The capability shall include, at a minimum, the capability to generate and deliver MSS data at the annual volume of Federal usage during fiscal year 1983, as determined by the Secretary. The capability may be provided by the contractor using whatever technologies the contractor may select. In addition, the contractor may make available data of a higher quality or of a different type than MSS data.

(b) The contract authorized by subsection (a)—

(1) shall be entered into as soon as practicable, allowing for the competitive procurement process;

(2) shall, in accordance with criteria determined and published by the Secretary, reasonably assure the provision of the capability described in subsection (a) for a period of six years, beginning as soon as practicable in order to minimize any interruption of data availability;

(3) shall terminate one year after the expiration of the six-year period described in paragraph (2);

(4) may, subject to section 305 of the Federal Property and Administrative Services Act of 1949 (41 U.S.C. 255), provide for a payment by the Secretary to cover a portion of the capital cost of providing such capability, which may be paid in installments (A) based on progress prior to the beginning of the six-year period described in paragraph (2), and (B) the sum of which shall be less than the total cost of procuring the system required to assure the capability for six years;

(5) shall provide that sale of digital remote-sensing data shall be in accordance with the provisions of section 303 of this title;

(6) shall not provide for any guaranteed data purchases by the Federal Government; and

(7) may provide that the contractor utilize, on a space-available basis, civilian Government satellites as platforms for a civil remote-sensing satellite system, if—

(A) the contractor immediately reimburses the Government for all related costs incurred with respect to such utilization, including a reasonable and proportionate share of fixed, spacecraft, data transmission, and launch costs; and

(B) such utilization would not interfere with or otherwise in any way compromise the intended civilian Government missions, as determined by the agency responsible for the civilian satellite.

(c) The contract authorized by subsection (a) shall be awarded on the basis of—

(1) the cost to the Government of the payment under subsection (b)(4);

(2) the reliability, technical competence, and financial condition of the contractor;

(3) the contractor's ability to develop the remote-sensing data market;

(4) the contractor's ability to supplement basic capabilities specified in section 302(a) by adding remote-sensing capabilities (at the contractor's expense and consistent with national security concerns) which maintain United States leadership in remote-sensing;

(5) the contractor's ability to meet the conditions for obtaining a license under title IV;

(6) the contractor's ability to provide digital remote-sensing data on a timely and reliable basis;

(7) the contractor's ability to effect a smooth transition with any contractor selected under title II;

(8) the royalty or profit- or revenue-sharing arrangement, or other such financial consideration offered to the Federal Government; and

(9) such other factors as the Secretary deems appropriate.

(d) If, as a result of the competitive process required by subsection (a), the Secretary receives no proposal which he finds acceptable under the conditions of this Act, the Secretary shall so certify and fully report his findings to the Congress. Thirty days after so certifying and reporting, the Secretary may reopen the competition. If no acceptable proposals are received after such subsequent competition, or if the Secretary decides not to reopen the competition, the Secretary shall so certify and fully report his findings to the Congress. Ninety days after so certifying and reporting, the Secretary is authorized to assure MSS data continuity by procurement and operation by the Federal Government of the necessary systems, subject to the availability of appropriations therefor. Such procurement and operation may include generation of data of a higher quality than MSS data.

SALE OF DATA

SEC. 303. (a) The contractor selected under section 302 shall sell data in accordance with the provisions of sections 601 and 602 of this Act.

(b) Any sale of digital remote-sensing data by the contractor to Federal agencies shall be on a nondiscriminatory basis, with the additional condition that at least 5 per centum of the price of each such sale shall be rebated to the Government (and thereby reduce the total net cost to the Government) as a royalty payment to the United States Treasury. Such royalty payments shall be required during the life of the contract authorized in section 302, or until such time as the cumulative total of such royalty payments equals the value of any payment made to the contractor by the Government under section 302(b)(4), whichever first occurs. Data sales to non-Federal buyers shall not be subject to such a rebate.

(c) After the six-year period described in section 302(b)(2), the contractor may continue to sell data and, if licensed under title IV of this Act, to operate a civil remote-sensing space system.

REPORT

SEC. 304. Two years after the date of the commencement of the six-year period described in section 302(b)(2) the Secretary shall report to the President and to the Congress on the progress of the transition to fully private financing, ownership, and operation of remote-sensing space systems, together with any recommendations for actions, including actions necessary to ensure United States leadership in civilian land remote-sensing from space.

TITLE IV—LICENSING OF PRIVATE REMOTE-SENSING SPACE SYSTEMS

GENERAL AUTHORITY

SEC. 401. The Secretary is authorized, after consultation with other appropriate Federal agencies, to grant, suspend, modify, or revoke licenses under this title, and to take any other such actions as he deems necessary in order to carry out the provisions of this title.

CONDITIONS FOR OPERATION

SEC. 402. (a) No private sector party may operate any remote-sensing space system which is subject to the jurisdiction or control of the United States (as determined by the Secretary) without a license pursuant to section 403.

(b) Any license issued pursuant to section 403 shall be subject to the following conditions:

(1) The system shall be operated in such manner as to preserve and promote the national security of the United States and to observe and implement the international obligations of the United States.

(2) Digital remote-sensing data shall be made available to all potential users on a nondiscriminatory basis.

(3) No license issued under this title shall protect the licenseholder from fair competition from other licenseholders.

(4) Any private sector party proposing to be licensed under section 403 shall agree, as a condition for the receipt of such license, that prior to disbanding or terminating operations under the license, the licenseholder will make disposition of any orbiting satellites in a manner satisfactory to the President.

(5) Any private sector party proposing to be licensed under section 403 shall agree, as a condition for the receipt of such license, to provide to the Secretary any data generated under such license which the Secretary may request for the purpose of archiving pursuant to section 602.

(6) For the purposes of ensuring compliance with the provisions of this Act concerning nondiscriminatory access to data, any private sector party proposing to be licensed under section 403 shall agree, as a condition for the receipt of such license—

(A) to notify the Secretary of any "value-added" activities (as defined by the Secretary by regulation) that will be conducted by the licensee or by a subsidiary or affiliate of the licensee; and

(B) to provide the Secretary with a plan for the conduct of such activities which will ensure compliance with such provisions concerning nondiscriminatory access.

AUTHORITY OF THE SECRETARY

SEC. 403. (a) The Secretary is authorized to license qualified private sector parties to operate civil remote-sensing space systems in accordance with the provisions of this Act.

(b) Any license issued under subsection (a) shall be in effect for such period as the Secretary may specify.

(c) Any private sector party may apply to the Secretary for issuance, transfer, or termination of a license under this title in a form and manner prescribed by the Secretary. Each application under this section shall set forth the activities proposed to be carried out under the license, including measures taken to comply with those operating requirements specified in section 402 of this Act.

(d) No license shall be granted by the Secretary unless he determines in writing that the applicant will comply with the requirements of this Act, the regulations issued pursuant to this Act, and the international obligations and national security concerns of the United States. The Secretary shall review any application and make a determination thereon within one hundred and twenty days of the receipt of an application. If final action has not occurred within such time, the Secretary shall inform the applicant of any pending issues and of actions required to resolve them.

(e) The Secretary may revoke, suspend, or modify a license issued under this title if the Secretary determines and notifies the licensee in writing that the licensee has substantially failed to comply with any provision of this Act, with any regulation issued under this Act, with any terms, conditions, or restrictions of such license, or with any international obligation or national security concern of the United States.

(f) Any applicant or licensee who makes a timely request for review of a denial of issuance or transfer; revocation; suspension; conditioning; or modification of a license shall be entitled to adjudication by the Secretary on the record after an opportunity for an agency hearing with respect to such denial, revocation, suspension, conditioning, or modification. Any final action by the Secretary under this subsection shall be subject to judicial review under chapter 7 of title 5, United States Code.

REGULATORY AUTHORITY OF THE SECRETARY

SEC. 404. (a) The Secretary may issue regulations to carry out the provisions of this title.

(b) Regulations issued by the Secretary under this title shall be promulgated only after public notice and comment in accordance with the provisions of section 553 of title 5, United States Code.

ENFORCEMENT AUTHORITY OF THE SECRETARY

SEC. 405. (a) Each license issued by the Secretary shall require the licensee—

(1) to allow the Secretary or his designated officers to inspect any financial or business records associated with remote-sensing or "value-added" activities, and

(2) to allow the Secretary or his designated officers to inspect any space-related or ground segment hardware or software to be utilized by the licensee in remote-sensing activities.

(b) It is unlawful for any person to violate any regulation or provision of any license issued under this Act, to violate any space treaty or law implementing any space treaty, or to prevent or inhibit the monitoring of remote-sensing activities or "value-added" activities by the Secretary or his designated officers.

(c) Any person who after notice and opportunity to be heard in accordance with title 5, United States Code, is found by the Secretary to have committed any act prohibited by subsection (b) shall be liable for a civil penalty of not more than $10,000 for each violation. Each day of continuing operation in violation shall constitute a separate violation. The Secretary may compromise, modify, or remit any such civil penalty.

(d) For the purpose of conducting any hearing under this section, the Secretary may issue subpenas for any materials, documents, or records, or for the attendance and testimony of witnesses.

(e) In carrying out his enforcement responsibilities, the Secretary may—

(1) seize any object, record, or report where it reasonably appears that such was used, is being used, or is likely to be used in violation of this Act; or

(2) make investigations and inquiries and administer to or take from any person an oath affirmation or affidavit concerning any matter relating to the enforcement of this Act.

(f) The Secretary is authorized to terminate any licensed operations on an immediate basis when it reasonably appears that operation in violation of any provision of this Act, or any provision of a license issued under this Act, or of any obligation of the United States under a space treaty, would be detrimental to the national interest.

AGENCY ROLES

SEC. 406. (a) A private sector party may apply for a license to operate a remote-sensing space system which utilizes, on a space-available basis, a civilian United States Government satellite or vehicle as a platform for such system.

(b) The Secretary, pursuant to the authorities of this title, may license such system if it meets all conditions of this Act, and if—

(1) the applicant agrees, as a condition for the receipt of such license, to reimburse the Government immediately for all related costs incurred with respect to such utilization, including a reasonable and proportionate share of fixed, spacecraft, data transmission, and launch costs; and

(2) such utilization would not interfere with or otherwise compromise the intended Government missions, as determined by the agency responsible for the satellite or vehicle.

(c) The Secretary may offer assistance to private sector parties in finding appropriate opportunities for such utilization.

(d) Federal agencies are authorized to enter into agreements for such utilization if such agreements are consistent with the agency's mission, statutory authority, and appropriation Acts, and if such remote-sensing space system is licensed by the Secretary.

(e) The provisions of this section do not apply to activities carried out pursuant to title V.

TERMINATION

SEC. 407. If, five years after the expiration of the six-year period described in section 302(b)(2), no private sector party has been licensed and continued in operation under the provisions of this title, the authority of this title shall terminate.

TITLE V—RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT

PURPOSE AND POLICY

SEC. 501. It is the purpose of this title to provide for a comprehensive civilian program of research, development, and demonstration to enhance the United States capabilities for remote-sensing from space, as well as to enhance the application and utilization of such capabilities.

CONTINUED FEDERAL RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT

SEC. 502. (a)(1) The Administrator of the National Aeronautics and Space Administration is directed to continue and to enhance such Administration's programs of remote-sensing research and development.

(2) The Administrator is authorized and encouraged to—

(A) conduct experimental space remote-sensing programs (including applications demonstration programs and basic research at universities);

(B) develop remote-sensing technologies and techniques, including those needed for monitoring the Earth and its environment; and

(C) conduct such research and development in cooperation with other public and private research entities, including private industry, universities, State and local governments, foreign governments, and international organizations, and to enter into arrangements (including joint ventures) which will foster such cooperation.

(b)(1) The Secretary shall conduct a continuing program of—

(A) research in applications of remote-sensing;

(B) monitoring of the Earth and its environment; and

(C) development of technology for such monitoring.

(2) Such program may include support of basic research at universities.

(3) The Secretary is authorized and encouraged to conduct such research, monitoring, and development in cooperation with other public and private research entities, including private industry, universities, State and local governments, foreign governments, and international organizations, and to enter into arrangements (including joint ventures) which will foster such cooperation.

(c) Other Federal agencies are authorized and encouraged to conduct research and development on the use of remote-sensing in fulfillment of their authorized missions, using funds appropriated for such purposes.

(d) The Secretary and the Administrator of the National Aeronautics and Space Administration shall, within one year after the date of enactment of this Act and biennially thereafter, jointly develop and transmit to the Congress a report which includes (1) a unified national plan for remote-sensing research and development applied to the Earth and its atmosphere; (2) a compilation of progress in the relevant ongoing research and development activities of the Federal agencies; and (3) an assessment of the state of our knowledge of the Earth and its atmosphere, the needs for additional research (including research related to operational Federal remote-sensing space programs), and opportunities available for further progress.

USE OF EXPERIMENTAL DATA

SEC. 503. Data gathered in Federal experimental space remote-sensing programs may be used in related research and development programs funded by the Federal Government (including applications programs) and cooperative research programs, but not for commercial uses or in competition with private sector activities, except as permitted by section 504.

SALE OF EXPERIMENTAL DATA

SEC. 504. Data gathered in Federal experimental space remote-sensing programs may be sold en bloc through a competitive process (consistent with national security interests and international obligations of the United States) to any United States entity which will market the data on a nondiscriminatory basis.

TITLE VI—GENERAL PROVISIONS

NONDISCRIMINATORY DATA AVAILABILITY

SEC. 601. (a) Any digital remote-sensing data generated by any system operator under the provisions of this Act shall be made available to all users on a nondiscriminatory basis in accordance with the requirements of this Act.

(b) Any system operator shall make publicly available the prices, policies, procedures, and other terms and conditions (but not, in accordance with section 104(3)(C), the names of buyers or their purchases) upon which the operator will sell such data.

ARCHIVING OF DATA

SEC. 602. (a) It is in the public interest for the United States Government—

(1) to maintain an archive of land remote-sensing satellite data for historical, scientific, and technical purposes, including long-term global environmental monitoring;

(2) to control the content and scope of the archive; and

(3) to assure the quality, integrity, and continuity of the archive.

(b) The Secretary shall provide for long-term storage, maintenance, and upgrading of a basic, global, land remote-sensing data set (hereafter referred to as the "basic data set") and shall follow reasonable archival practices to assure proper storage and preservation of the basic data set and timely access for parties requesting data. The basic data set which the Secretary assembles in the Government archive shall remain distinct from any inventory of data which a system operator may maintain for sales and for other purposes.

(c) In determining the initial content of, or in upgrading, the basic data set, the Secretary shall—

(1) use as a baseline the MSS data currently archived;

(2) take into account future technical and scientific developments and needs;

(3) consult with and seek the advice of users and producers of remote-sensing data and data products, keeping the Congress advised of such contacts;

(4) consider the public's need for data which may be duplicative in terms of geographical coverage but which differ in terms of season, spectral bands, resolution, or other relevant factors;

(5) include, as the Secretary deems appropriate, digital remote-sensing data generated either by the Landsat system, pursuant to title III, or by license holders under title IV; and

(6) include, as he deems appropriate, data collected by foreign ground stations or by foreign remote-sensing space systems.

(d) All original data (or copies thereof) shall, on request, be made promptly available to the Secretary by any system operator in a form suitable for processing for data storage, maintenance, and access. The Secretary is authorized (subject to the availability of appropriations) to pay to such system operator reasonable costs for reproduction and transmittal of any such data.

(e) Any system operator shall have the exclusive right to sell all data that the operator provides to the United States remote-sensing data archive for a period to be determined by the Secretary but not to exceed ten years from the date the data are sensed. In the case of data generated from the Landsat system prior to the implementation of the contract described in section 201(a) of this Act, any contractor selected pursuant to section 201 shall have the exclusive right to market such data on behalf of the United States Government for the duration of such contract. A system operator may relinquish his exclusive right and consent to distribution from the archive before the period of exclusive right has expired by terminating his offer to sell particular data.

(f) After expiration of such exclusive right to sell, or after relinquishment of such right, the data provided to the United States remote-sensing data archive shall be in the public domain and shall be made available to requesting parties by the Secretary at prices reflecting reasonable costs of reproduction and transmittal.

(g) In carrying out the functions of this section, the Secretary may use existing facilities or may contract with a private sector party or parties for the performance of such functions, subject to the availability of appropriations therefor.

NONREPRODUCTION

SEC. 603. Digital remote-sensing data distributed by any system operator under the provisions of this Act may be sold under the condition that such data will not be reproduced or disseminated by the purchaser.

REIMBURSEMENT FOR ASSISTANCE; SALE OF EQUIPMENT

SEC. 604. (a) The Administrator of the National Aeronautics and Space Administration, the Secretary of Defense, and the heads of other Federal agencies are authorized to provide assistance to system operators under the provisions of this Act. Substantial assistance, such as launch services, shall be reimbursed by the system operator.

(b) The Secretary may allow a licensee under section 403, or any other private sector party, to buy or otherwise acquire the use of equipment from the Landsat system, when such equipment is no longer needed for the operation of that system or for the sale of data from that system. Officials of other Federal civilian agencies are authorized and encouraged to cooperate with the Secretary in carrying out this subsection.

RADIO FREQUENCY ALLOCATION

SEC. 605. The Federal Communications Commission and the Secretary are encouraged to allocate to any license holder under title IV of this Act access to Government radio frequencies and other civil radio frequencies appropriate for space remote-sensing systems in a timely manner consistent with international obligations and with the national interest.

CONSULTATION

SEC. 606. (a) The Secretary shall consult with the Secretary of Defense on all matters under this Act affecting national security. The Secretary of Defense shall be responsible for determining those conditions, consistent with this Act, necessary to meet national security concerns of the United States and for notifying the Secretary promptly of such conditions.

(b)(1) The Secretary shall consult with the Secretary of State on all matters under this Act affecting international obligations. The Secretary of State shall be responsible for determining those conditions, consistent with this Act, necessary to meet international obligations and policies of the United States and for notifying the Secretary promptly of such conditions.

(2) The Secretary of State is authorized and encouraged to provide land remote-sensing data, technology, and training to developing nations as a component of programs of international aid.

(3) The Secretary of State shall promptly report to the Secretary any instances outside the United States of discriminatory distribution of data.

(c) If, as a result of conditions imposed on a system operator on the basis of national security or international obligations or policies, the Secretary (in consultation with the Secretary of Defense or the Secretary of State, as the case may be) determines that additional costs will be incurred by the system operator, or that past development costs (including the cost of capital) will not be recovered by the system operator, the Secretary may require the agency or agencies requesting such conditions to reimburse the system operator for such additional or development costs, excluding anticipated profits.

AMENDMENT TO NATIONAL AERONAUTICS AND SPACE ADMINISTRATION AUTHORIZATION, 1983

SEC. 607. Subsection (a) of section 201 of the National Aeronautics and Space Administration Authorization, 1983, is amended to read as follows:

"(a) The Secretary of Commerce is hereby authorized to plan and provide for the management and operation of civil remote-sensing space systems, which may include the Landsat 4 and 5 satellites and associated ground system equipment transferred from the National Aeronautics and Space Administration; to provide for user fees; and to plan for the transfer of the ownership and operation of civil, operational remote-sensing space systems to the private sector when in the national interest.".

RELATION TO OTHER LAWS

SEC. 608. The requirements of this Act are in addition to, and not in lieu of, any other provision of law.

AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS

SEC. 609. (a) There are authorized to be appropriated to the Secretary $10,000,000 for fiscal year 1985 for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of section 302, title IV, and section 602 of this Act.

(b) The authorization provided for under subsection (a) shall be in addition to moneys authorized pursuant to title II of the National Aeronautics and Space Administration Authorization Act of 1983 (Public Law 97-324).

TITLE VII—PROHIBITION OF COMMERCIALIZATION OF WEATHER SATELLITES

PROHIBITION

SEC. 701. Neither the President nor any other official of the Government shall make any effort to lease, sell, or transfer to the private sector, commercialize, or in any way dismantle any portion of the weather satellite systems operated by the Department of Commerce or any successor agency.

FUTURE CONSIDERATIONS

SEC. 702. Regardless of any change in circumstances subsequent to the enactment of this Act, even if such change makes it appear to be in the national interest to com-mercialize weather satellites, neither the President nor any official shall take any action prohibited by section 701 of this Act unless this title has first been repealed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MOAKLEY). Pursuant to the rule, a second is not required on this motion.

The gentleman from Missouri (Mr. VOLKMER) will be recognized for 20 minutes and the gentleman from New Mexico (Mr. LUJAN) will be recognized for 20 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Missouri (Mr. VOLKMER).

Mr. VOLKMER. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, I rise to support H.R. 5155, the Land Remote-Sensing Commercialization Act of 1984 and to urge my colleagues to join me in voting for this legislation.

The committee has held hearings on this general subject matter for several years. Recently our focus has been sharpened as a result of several specific commercialization proposals.

The jurisdiction for this matter is shared between my subcommittee and the subcommittee chaired by the gentleman from New York (Mr. SCHEUER). We held hearings beginning in April 1983 and continuing in June and July. In November, we held hearings on draft legislation. In February of this year we introduced H.R. 4836, and had hearings on that bill in March. Based on testimony and comments from industry and agencies, a clean bill, H.R. 5155, was introduced on March 15 and reported by the Committee on Science and Technology on March 27, 1984, without amendment.

Mr. Speaker, I have taken the time to recount this history because the Members should know that this bill has been given careful consideration. We have not lightly dealt with the commercialization of our Nation's space remote-sensing capability.

The committee has always supported the commercialization of space technology when appropriate, while realizing that such commercialization might need statutory policy guidance on a case-by-case basis.

We have always intended for land remote sensing to be commercialized because so many of its applications are commercial. The marketing efforts of a private sector operator will result in wider use of the data and commercial pressures for efficiency will result in more cost-effective technology.

Despite the committee's feeling that this remote-sensing technology should be commercialized, we also realized that there need to be safeguards to protect the public and the national interest. The committee has therefore looked carefully at this commercialization process.

Mr. Speaker, many Members may remember that some of the proposals floating around about this time a year ago were a mockery of commercialization. For example, there were proposals to commercialize the weather satellites. Leaving aside the potential adverse effects on public safety, these proposals would have amounted to establishing a monopoly and then giving it a cost-plus contract. Obviously, this would have resulted in none of the efficiencies we expect from private-sector operation. Of course, H.R. 5155 prohibits commercialization of weather satellites.

There have also been proposals that would allow a private system operator to sell data to some users but not to others. One bad effect of this would be to allow grain speculators to profit at the expense of American farmers. By establishing a firm policy of nondiscriminatory access to data, H.R. 5155 would prevent such abuses.

I hope these examples have made it clear that we have brought to the floor a bill that every Member can support.

Mr. Speaker, let me now briefly outline the provisions of the bill.

Title I contains findings, purposes, policies, and definitions. An important policy established here would call for nondiscriminatory data access.

Title II provides for the first phase of commercialization which would be marketing of data from the existing Landsat system. Title to the system would remain with the Government.

Title III provides for the next phase of commercialization by authorizing limited Federal assistance for a private system to follow Landsat. This assistance would be awarded after a competitive process.

Title IV contains procedures for a simple licensing of private system operators.

Title V is very important because it authorizes and directs a vigorous Federal R&D program to insure that the United States maintains its preeminence in this field.

Title VI contains general provisions, the most important of which is the statutory establishment of a data archive.

Title VII contains a simple prohibition of commercialization of weather satellites.

Mr. Speaker, at this point I would like to explain the provisions of the bill. H.R. 5155 is written in seven titles. There are three progressive phases of commercialization of land remote sensing established in titles II, III, and IV of the bill. The other titles provide a favorable context for the commercialization process.

Title I contains findings, purposes, policies, and definitions. Section 103(c) of the bill establishes as policy of the United States that civilian digital remote-sensing data shall be made available to all potential users on a nondiscriminatory basis. Also, section 104 of the act spells out the definition of this term—on a nondiscriminatory basis—so as to allow as much commercial flexibility as possible without favoring one buyer or class of buyers over another.

Title II provides for the first phase of commercialization. A contractor would be selected to market all new and archived data from the existing Landsat system and would also be permitted if he desired, to contract for operating that system. The Secretary would continue to own this system while the private sector contractor develops a market and makes data available to users. This will preserve data continuity while the private sector builds the follow-on land remote-sensing space system provided for by title III.

Title III provides for a 6-year transition period as the next phase of commericalization with the 6-year period defined in terms of assurance of data continuity. The Secretary of Commerce is authorized to pay some of the capital costs of a private sector operator who will provide the system capability necessary to assure data continuity for the 6-year period. This capital payment is, in effect, a subsidy to help the private-sector party build and launch the necessary system. The Secretary would be required to go through a competitive selection process and one criterion for selection of the private-sector operator would be the amount of subsidy required.

The committee believes that the 6-year period will be an adequate amount of time to determine whether or not the land remote-sensing business will be commercially viable. If such a business cannot be sustained by sale of data, then we will be faced with a decision as to whether we want to continue with Federal support or simply to take this Nation out of land remote-sensing altogether.

The provisions of H.R. 5155 give the Secretary some latitude in how to proceed with the commercialization process. For example, nothing in the bill would prohibit the Secretary from combining the procurements called for in title II and title III into one action. However, if such an action did not result in accomplishing the objectives of both titles II and III, the Secretary would be required to proceed with separate procurement actions.

Title IV provides a procedure for licensing all private system operators including the operator receiving the subsidy under title III. The constraints that would be placed on license holders are few, but would include nondiscriminatory data access and foreign policy and national security limitations. This title also establishes administrative procedures and regulatory and enforcement authorities for the Secretary of Commerce.

Title V authorizes and encourages continued Federal research and development in civil space remote sensing. Our committee strongly believes that the transfer of operational responsibility to the private sector does not relieve the Federal Government of its obligation to conduct long-term, high-risk research in remote sensing. This title therefore spells out research mandates for both NOAA and NASA and encourages agencies using remote-sensing data to carry out applications research. In addition, sections 503 and 504 taken together provide that data generated in experimental remote-sensing purposes can be used for research purposes without limitation but can be used for commercial purposes only in a way that will not undercut any private-sector operator. This is achieved by requiring that such experimental data be sold en bloc on a commercial, that is competitive, basis.

Title VI contains several general provisions, perhaps the most important of which is the requirement that the Secretary of Commerce establish an archive of land remote-sensing data for historical, scientific, and technical purposes, including long-term global environmental monitoring. This provision will insure that many of the public benefits of land remote sensing are indeed preserved once the commercialization process is underway. Section 609 authorizes the appropriation of $10 million for fiscal year 1985 for carrying out the provisions of section 302, title IV, and section 602 of the bill. Section 302 contains the language providing for the payment of capital costs of a follow-on system to assure data continuity for 6 years. The $10 million authorized here will not be sufficient to pay for that system. We expect that the requirement for building the follow-on system will be several times the amount authorized, but it will certainly be less than present Government costs to procure and operate a land remote-sensing system.

Title VII would prohibit the commercialization of weather satellites at this time. The language of this title amounts to a rather strict prohibition of any effort to commercialize those systems and provides that no such effort may be made by the President or any official until title VII has been repealed.

Mr. Speaker, I believe that from this description it is clear that we have worked hard on this bill and have dealt with all of the problems that have existed in earlier commercialization proposals. I urge my colleagues to support H.R. 5155.

Mr. DASCHLE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DASCHLE. Mr. Speaker, I rise, not so much in opposition to H.R. 5155, a bill setting forth guidelines and parameters for the possible commercialization of the Landsat system, as I do to express some very serious concerns on my part as to the necessity and the ultimate wisdom of the entire idea of commercialization. As a set of guidelines, I complement the committee on its product as reflected in this bill. As far as possible, it does produce guidelines that will assure continued access to data at the least possible cost to the Government under commercialization.

On the other hand, as I have indicated, I wonder if, in fact, the commercialization of this function is indeed in the national interest. The information gathered by the Landsat system does provide manifold benefits in the national interest. The argument for commercialization, as is exhibited in the committee report on this legislation, is that commercialization of the system will provide greater data markets, and that the Federal Government can contract for the data it desires with the private interests running the system. However, in testimony before the Subcommittee on Science and Applications on June 21, 1983, Dr. John W. Townsend, president of Fairchild Space Co., said the following:

> This statement will probably be viewed as heresy by my industrial colleagues, but the real forcing function for increasing industrial productivity and efficiency is competition. In a sole source situation, the only management motivation is to increase profits as far as possible until checked through regulation or negotiation.

This statement, I think, calls into real question the proposed savings that commercialization will bring to the Federal Government. We only have to look at sole source contractors for the Pentagon to see how well this system works.

On the other hand, given the administration's fervor for commercialization, and the fact that it has already involved itself in RFP's on this matter, the likelihood of the administration expanding the Landsat system to fill existing and future needs is doubtful. Two months ago, we launched Landsat 5, the last planned satellite in the Landsat system. There are obviously no further plans by the administration to launch any further Landsat satellites, or to upgrade our present facilities. Without this administration support, it is unlikely that Congress, on its own, will provide either the authorizations or further funding for these desirable expansions. So, by default, however distasteful, it appears that this commercialization may be the only way we can continue to expand the data we need.

I am disappointed that the administration has been so short-sighted on this issue. I am further disturbed that the committee bill before us today does not, to my understanding, provide for congressional approval of any specific contract the Secretary of Commerce may enter into relative to this issue. Given the administration's propensity for privatization, no matter what the ultimate cost to the citizens of this country, I am afraid that this approach will indeed leave the fox guarding the chicken coop.

It does appear, however, that, given the administration's refusal to support updating of the system, commercialization may be the only way to go. I do, however, have some specific questions that I would like to address to the manager of the bill, relative to title VI of the bill, dealing with archiving, and the role the EROS Data Center may play in that function.

In the last analysis, I feel that this commercialization is premature and may wind up costing us more than it saves, while at the same time it may well be denying us access to the data we need. The administration's single minded pursuit of privatization, combined with its stubborn refusal to update the present Landsat system, may be forcing us into a very foolish mistake.

I am particularly concerned over the role that the EROS data center in South Dakota will have in the future of any commercialized Landsat data collection and dissemination system. As you are aware, the EROS data center currently is actively involved in archiving data of the type we are talking about here and is, to my knowledge, the only facility currently doing so. Is it your perception of the thrust of H.R. 5155 that there is a role for the continuation of this archiving function at EROS, and, even more importantly, an expanded role for such a function?

Mr. VOLKMER. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for his question. Indeed, I am aware of the valuable role played by the EROS data center in archiving this and many other kinds of data. I am further aware that the current RFP process underway in the Department of Commerce does not mandate that a government archive would be maintained. Further, the administration position in the decision memorandum announced on March 8, 1983, was either to commercialize land remote sensing or to drop it entirely.

H.R. 5155 both provides for continued Federal support for land remote sensing until it can be commercialized successfully, and also in section 602 mandates that the Secretary of Commerce maintain a data archive. And as you have suggested H.R. 5155 calls for a "global" data set which would expand the role of the EROS data center.

Mr. DASCHLE. If the gentleman will yield further, again, just for a point of clarification. This bill does not, of course, mandate the commercialization of any Landsat facilities. It is correct to say that this legislation leaves to the discretion of the administration, within the guidelines outlined here, the final decision as to the overall question of commercialization, and to the acceptance of a specific contract?

Mr. VOLKMER. The gentleman is correct. Section 201(c)(1) prohibits the transfer to the private sector of any part or all of the Landsat system. Further, section 201(d) gives the Secretary of Commerce authority to continue operating the Landsat system if no acceptable contract can be reached. There is similar language in section 302(d) regarding a follow-on system. For example, we would not want the Secretary to accept a proposal that would cost the Government more money or that would preclude the archiving function. Our intent is to pursue commercialization while protecting the public interest.

Mr. DASCHLE. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will further yield, I want to thank the gentleman for this information.

Mr. BATEMAN. Mr. Speaker, will the chairman of the subcommittee, the gentleman from Missouri (Mr. VOLKMER), yield for the purpose of a question?

Mr. VOLKMER. I yield to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. BATEMAN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to pose a question to the chairman, in the hope that we might clarify the committee's intent with reference to a part of the language that is in the committee report.

On page 30 of the committee report, there is a paragraph relating to title VII of the bill that I believe might lead to an unfortunate and unintended interpretation of the committee's intent. That paragraph states:

> The committee further notes that title VII does not in any way prohibit the Secretary from carrying out his responsibility to operate the weather satellites by means of contracts with private sector operators.

Would the chairman agree that the transfer of the functions of the Wallops Command and Data Acquisition Station to a private sector operator by contract is prohibited by title VII?

Mr. VOLKMER. Yes, I agree with the gentleman from Virginia. The Secretary must continue to operate the weather satellites and such a transfer would certainly constitute a commercialization that would be a clear violation of title VII, and the committee did not intend to leave any other impression. The purpose of the paragraph the gentleman refers to was to indicate that NOAA's current practice of contracting for certain limited functions would continue to be acceptable practice. For example, I understand certain maintenance functions are now contracted to the original equipment manufacturers. If cost effective, this could continue.

Mr. BATEMAN. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for his clarifying remarks.

Mr. VOLKMER. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. LUJAN. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of the bill. Over the past 11 years, more than 20 bills were introduced dealing with remote-sensing issues. Although land remote sensing has had strong support from Congress throughout its history, there has been a long series of reports, studies, recommendations, and hearings on the issues.

Last year, the President announced his policy to have the Department of Commerce consider the feasibility of transferring the remote-sensing system to the private sector. Since then, there has been a lot of confusion about the President's proposal. The President did not decide to sell the weather satellites, but rather asked the Department of Commerce to determine if it was feasible. Since the transfer of the weather satellites is not considered to be appropriate now, this bill prohibits commercialization of weather satellites.

In contrast, the transfer of the land remote-sensing system to the private sector is not only feasible, but very appropriate. It is the Government's role to do the basic research and development and then transfer the technology to the private sector. From the beginning of the Landsat program, it has been assumed that the technology would eventually be commercialized.

Unfortunately, up until now, no definite plan was ever developed for commercialization. This bill provides an excellent, well-thought-out approach to allow Landsat to evolve into a profitable private sector enterprise. The Committee on Science and Technology and the Congress as a whole have supported commercialization of space technology over the years. This bill is a continuation of that philosophy.

Furthermore, the bill is consistent with the administration's position, and in fact is intended to be completely complementary to the process being followed by the Department of Commerce.

For these reasons, I urge my colleagues to join me in support of this bill.

● Mr. SCHEUER. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of H.R. 5155, the Land Remote-Sensing Commercialization Act of 1984.

As the gentleman from Missouri (Mr. VOLKMER) indicated, the issues which underlie this legislation have been carefully considered during the course of nine joint hearings that our two subcommittees have held over the year. As a result of this careful consideration and of the efforts that we have made to meet Members' concerns, H.R. 5155 enjoys strong bipartisan support on the Committee on Science and Technology. In addition, on the basis of testimony that we received in March of this year from the Director of the Source Evaluation Board for Civil Remote-Sensing, the bill is, in the main, strongly endorsed by the administration.

The level of cooperation between the Congress and the administration on this issue is remarkable in light of the intractable impasse which existed not 1 year ago. There are two reasons why we have come such a long way since then. First, during the fall of last year, the Congress passed concurrent resolutions and ultimately an appropriations bill which finally laid to rest the administration's ill-conceived proposal to sell the Nation's weather satellites. Second, there has been a growing consensus that it is now timely and in the public interest to begin the orderly transition toward commercial operation of civil remote-sensing from space. H.R. 5155 is responsive to this need; it constitutes a sound approach to establishing a market-based commercial system, without compromising our national security, public safety, or international interests.

I have been greatly encouraged over the past several months that the administration, under the leadership of the Department of Commerce, has modified its policies to the point that they are nearly alined with the policies embodied in the legislation that we are considering today. This movement by the administration has been a very positive step, signaling to me that we can reach agreement quickly on the issue of land remote-sensing commercialization. Consensus and quick legislative action are absolutely essential if the United States is to avoid handing over to foreign competitors a technology that is ripe for commercialization.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to expand on what the gentleman from Missouri (Mr. VOLKMER) has said and provide some further detail on a few of the major issues that arose during the consideration of the legislation. First, the committee was aware that Public Law 98-166 prohibited the expenditure of funds in fiscal year 1984 on any proposal to transfer the Nation's civil weather satellites to the private sector. In adopting title VII of H.R. 5155, the committee has taken this prohibition one step further: Any future actions leading toward commercialization of weather satellites would not be permitted until such time as title VII is repealed.

We have taken this strong position because all of the evidence that the committee has heard indicates that sale of the weather satellites would be a terrible deal for the U.S. taxpayer. Sale of the satellites would not lead toward a truly competitive and commercial situation, but rather toward a monopoly in which the only customer—the U.S. Government—would be dependent upon both the technical competence and the good will of a single company operating under the security of a long-terms, cost-plus contract. In all likelihood, this monopoly would end up costing the Government more than it presently expends for government operation of weather satellites.

Economics aside, the sale would have extremely serious implications for both national security and public safety. Selling the weather satellites would necessitate significant, and perhaps unwieldy, oversight and regulation by the Department of Defense, which relies on civil weather satellite data both in its routine operations and in emergencies. The threat to public services arises because a private operator with a secure, long-term contract would have little motivation to improve his services. As a result, technology would stagnate, which would hurt everyone who relies on weather information: the farmer, the pilot, the citizen dependent on Federal tornado and hurricane warnings.

In placing restrictions on commercialization of weather satellites, we wanted to avoid a repetition of the events of late 1983, when American industry was asked to expend millions of dollars in responding to an RFP which, because of its inclusion of weather satellites, had very little chance of success.

A second issue of great concern to the committee was the necessity, while effecting the transition of land remote sensing to the private sector, of preserving legitimate national security concerns and international commitments of the United States. These issues have been very thoughtfully raised by the gentleman from Texas (Mr. BROOKS) and thoroughly discussed in recent publications by the General Accounting Office and the Office of Technology Assessment.

The international and national security aspects of remote sensing are precisely the areas which necessitate continuing Government oversight and control of private space ventures. In the area of national security, it would clearly be inappropriate for the U.S. Government to permit its citizens to engage in activities that amount to intelligence gathering as a commercial enterprise. In the area of international relations, the Landsat program has served as a valuable foreign policy tool for over a decade, in a number of direct and indirect ways. We have provided data, services, and training in land remote sensing as a form of foreign aid to over 40 nations worldwide. By the same token, these exchanges have helped to open lines of communication between U.S. political and business interests and the governmental and technical infrastructure of these nations.

Further, by providing land remote-sensing data without prejudice or favored access, the U.S. civil remote-sensing program has been free from charges of military surveillance or economic exploitation. By maintaining this high ground, we have been able to argue credibly in international fora that any nation should have a right to observe any other country from space—the so-called open skies policy which has served our national interests well since its first articulation by President Eisenhower.

We have worked closely with the national security agencies, the Department of State, and other congressional committees to insure that H.R. 5155 protects and preserves these vital interests. The legislation does so by designating the Secretary of Defense and the Secretary of State as responsible for identifying those national security and international concerns which must be met by any private operator. The Secretary of Commerce would ultimately be responsible for implementing these provisions and for monitoring their compliance through a licensing procedure. I am confident that these provisions will protect our national interests without unduly hampering a commercial operator.

Another issue which surfaced in the consideration of this legislation was the need for a continuing Federal role in the monitoring of the global environment from space. Land remote-sensing technology provides the opportunity for observing at regular intervals small-scale and large-scale changes in the features of the Earth. For example, it is possible to use this technology to observe changes in the health and extent of the world's forests and crops; to record land-use changes; and to monitor the gradual impacts of air-borne and water-borne pollutants on our natural resources.

Long-term monitoring of this sort is a wise investment. It is because of such long-term observations that we now know that the Earth is slowly warming as a result of the gradual buildup of carbon dioxide in the atmosphere—the "greenhouse effect." It is because we did not have adequate monitoring in the past that we are now groping for answers to the acid rain problem.

We cannot expect a private operator to maintain an extensive inventory of data for the purpose of long-term environmental monitoring. Environmental monitoring is a legitimate Government function, not a commercial activity. The bill recognizes this and, in section 602, directs the Secretary of Commerce to create such an inventory and to maintain it in such a way as to guarantee the quality and usefulness of the data for purposes of global environmental monitoring.

Finally, let me touch on what I consider to be the most important policy issue in this debate—the issue of "nondiscriminatory data access." What I mean by this ternm is, very simply, that any private remote-sensing operator would have to make his data available to everyone on the same public terms—he could not choose his customers to favor one over another. I have already indicated one reason why nondiscriminatory access is so important—it preserves the "high ground" for the U.S. Government during debates in international fora over the "open skies" policy.

But there are other, equally compelling reasons for this policy. It would encourage any operator to sell data very broadly and to structure his marketing efforts to reach as many customers as possible. It protects the so-called "value-added" firms, the real developers of the market, from unfair practices by the system operator. And it is likely to serve U.S. business and political interests by facilitating sales of both data and services provided by U.S. firms.

I believe that it would be shortsighted and unwise to allow any U.S. company to sell remote-sensing data in a proprietary manner. To do so would be to risk both broad application of the technology and our national goodwill in the interests of short-term and very marginal commercial gains.

Mr. Speaker, the United States, through the National Aeronautics and Space Administration, developed the land remote-sensing technology and brought it to where it stands today—at the brink of commercial exploitation. Last month's responses to the administration's RFP indicate that U.S. industry is ready and able to enter the competitive international marketplace in this field. This legislation will enable our aerospace companies to compete effectively. They support the legislation, as does the administration and a bipartisan coalition on the committee. This is a good bill, and I urge all Members to lend their strong support.●

● Mr. MCGRATH. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of H.R. 5155.

The commercialization of remote-sensing satellite systems has been an issue we have been debating in the Science Committee for almost 4 years. I am extremely pleased that we finally have a piece of legislation that seems to address nearly all of the concerns that have been expressed, and which has broad bipartisan support. The distinguished chairman of the Science Committee, DON FUQUA, is to be commended for his leadership in bringing this important legislation to the floor.

H.R. 5155 effects a gradual transition from Government to fully private ownership and operation of civilian land remote-sensing satellites. It also complements the RFP process, which is in its final stages at the Department of Commerce.

Two major concerns which Members expressed regarding the proposed commercialization were that our national security not be jeopardized and that our international obligations be met. H.R. 5155 contains a framework for insuring that these concerns are addressed, and also insures that any private entrepreneur continues the current U.S. policy of nondiscriminatory access to land remote-sensing data.

A concern that I have expressed several times is that commercialization of this system be a good deal for the American taxpayer. It calls for a definite end to the involvement of the Federal Government in the operational aspect of land remote sensing after 6 years, if the Secretary has gone forward with the process spelled out in the bill. The one exception is that if none of the bids received turn out to be attractive, the Secretary is authorized to continue to operate the system.

Perhaps most important of all, H.R. 5155 provides for a market-driven system. The private sector is encouraged to make many of the critical decisions, and the technology above a minimum baseline is not dictated, thus allowing the system to be driven by user needs.

I urge my colleagues to support this important legislation.●

● Mr. ANDREWS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, it is with distinct pleasure that I rise today to speak on behalf of the Land Remote Sensing Commercialization Act of 1984, the final product of a truly pioneering, cooperative, and innovative effort on the part of HAROLD VOLKMER, chairman of the House Science and Technology Subcommittee on Space, JAMES SCHEUER, chairman of the Subcommittee on Natural Resources, Agricultural Research and the Environment, and their talented staffs. The purpose of this bill, Mr. Speaker, is to provide for the phased transfer of our civil land remote sensing capability to the private sector in a way that opens up this exciting field to private industry while guaranteeing continued availability of data, protecting national security interests, and maintaining international obligations and policies.

The Federal Government's land remote sensing program has been a Government-supported experimental research program since 1972. The last in a series of five satellites, Landsat-5, is currently orbiting the Earth at an altitude of about 570 miles, gathering data in both the visible and infrared spectrum pertaining to features of the Earth. That data can be processed into highly desirable commercial information in a growing variety of applications, including mineral and oil exploration, predictions of agricultural yield and crop health, agricultural classification, land-use mapping, forest management, hydrology, cartography, and environmental monitoring. That is the beginning of what promises to become a longer list.

The data provided by land remote sensing satellites has tremendous commercial potential, particularly if that data is efficiently obtained, affordable, and tailored to the specific needs of its users. Even though the market for this data has been suppressed by uncertainty, studies project its dramatic expansion. Passage of this bill will facilitate expansion of the land remote sensing data market by sending a positive and strong signal to investors that Congress is willing not only to release its hold on this potential new industry, but lay out the ground rules for its development and follow them.

H.R. 5155 will encourage a vigorous private sector role in civilian land remote sensing by creating a limited duration, Government industry partnership during a transition period preceding a fully private financing and operation of remote sensing. The Commerce Secretary would be authorized to accept bids from private sector firms to market data from the current Landsat system. After the demise of that system, the Secretary would select and could partially finance a private sector firm to build and operate a land-sensing system geared to the needs of the marketplace. The involvement of the Federal Government would end after 6 years.

Mr. Speaker, I want to assure you and other Members of the House that this bill in no way sanctions the privatization of weather satellites. In fact, title VII of the bill states the committee's intention to prohibit future actions leading toward commercialization of weather satellites. And, as you recall, last November, I sponsored and the Congress approved House Concurrent Resolution 168 which expresses the sense of the Congress that the commercialization of weather satellites is not appropriate. Not only are there very limited commercial prospects for weather information—the Federal Government would be the only customers—but weather satellites are critical to national security. Besides, the United States obtains from other nations a great deal of information critical to our military operations in return for our weather satellite data. Moreover, testimony before our committee overwhelmingly demonstrates the importance of the National Weather Service to public safety, particularly in hurricane situations.

But it is not my purpose, Mr. Speaker, to argue against weather satellites. Rather, I want to urge my colleagues to support the Land Remote Sensing Commercialization Act and congratulate Chairmen VOLKMER and SCHEUER for a job truly well done.●

● Mr. NELSON of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of the commercialization of land remote-sensing satellites commonly known as the Landsat system.

The Science and Technology Committee has supported commercialization of research and development projects over the past few years when such commercialization has been appropriate. Presently, recognizing the need for the Federal Government to insure the continuity and availability of accurate land remote-sensing data, this legislation is now appropriate.

Landsat 5, launched March 1, 1984, is the last of the planned land remote-sensing satellites. In the fiscal year 1982 budget request, plans for funding 6 and 7 were dropped with the expectation of the private sector to carry on the program. Mr. Speaker, without this legislation, those plans cannot be ventured.

Further, in accomplishing commercialization purposes, this legislation takes into account the concerns of the public by addressing national security considerations, international obligations, and program continuity. This legislation is well thought out and has taken into account the concerns of the American people.

I would encourage my colleagues to recognize the need for this bill and to give it favorable consideration.●

● Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, last session Congress sent a very clear message to the President that it had no intention of allowing our Nation's weather satellites to be sold to the private sector. This bill gives us another opportunity to transmit that same message to the President to insure that this proposal will not surface again.

While it appears that the future of the weather satellites has been settled, the future of our Nation's land remote-sensing satellite, known as Landsat, has remained uncertain.

Last September, the Committee on Government Operations held a hearing to examine the foreign implications of the commercialization of Landsat. The committee learned that Landsat has been a significant maker of international friends for the United States over the years. It also found that many of the nations around the world have come to rely heavily on Landsat data and are deeply concerned that this information might become either temporarily or permanently unavailable because of the commercialization effort. It became clear that our friends abroad need some assurance that Landsat data will be available continuously whether or not the system was commercialized. In addition, they need to know that data from Landsat would not be made available on a discriminatory basis.

For 25 years, the United States has fought for the open skies policy which allows all of our Nation's satellites to fly without restrictions over every nation in the world. Maintenance of this policy hinges directly on the fact that this country has made the information acquired from civilian remote sensing satellites freely available to all nations of the world. Despite the importance of this policy, the administration has offered to renege on our Nation's commitment to it if so doing will facilitate the commercialization of Landsat.

The bill before us mandates continuation of the nondiscriminatory data distribution regardless of whether Landsat is run by the Federal Government or a private operator. In addition, it maximizes the chances of assuring a continuous flow of data from Landsat by establishing a clear timetable and framework for commercialization. I believe that it is very important that we take the steps necessary to assure the continuation of Landsat and that we not deviate from our commitment to the nondiscriminatory distribution of data.

For these reasons, I support this bill and urge you to do the same.●

● Mr. FUQUA. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of H.R. 5155, the Landsat Remote-Sensing Commercialization Act of 1984. I want to congratulate my colleagues Congressman VOLKMER, chairman of the Subcommittee on Space Science and Applications, and Congressman SCHEUER, chairman of the Subcommittee on Natural Resources Agriculture Research and Environment for their efforts and diligence in perfecting this legislation.

This legislation reflects the continuing interest and concern of the committee that an effective commercial land remote sensing system develop from the highly successful NASA Landsat experimental program.

As a result of man's rapidly increasing population, his rapidly rising standard of living, his need for increasing energy supplies, and his need for ever increasing amounts of food, information on Earth resources becomes more important to our daily lives. Today, more than ever, man recognizes that the capability of the Earth to support life has limits and that to survive he must seek more efficient ways to manage his limited resources. As supplies become more scarce, we need more timely and accurate information. Resource data requirements extend to whole regions of the country and with the highly interactive world society in which we live, many activities involved with food, mineral resources, and environmental effects require information on a global scale.

This broad information base can best be achieved though the use of data gathered by satellites. In terms of global coverage, this data can be updated rapidly and frequently, can be relatively easily understood, and can be integrated into common formats for general use. Data gathered by satellites on Earth resources makes use of a rapidly expanding technology often referred to as remote sensing.

Without minimizing the technological problems, there is good reason and evidence to be confident about the health and prospects of the technology of remote sensing and its use. The potential has been demonstrated in geology, oceanography, meteorology, land management crop prediction, and a host of other disciplines.

The Committee on Science and Technology has held numerous hearings on how to institutionalize an operational land remote sensing system beginning in 1977.

In October 1978 President Carter called for a plan of action on how to encourage private sector direct participation in the establishment and operation of civil remote sensing systems. In November 1979 President Carter assigned to the Department of Commerce the management responsibility for civil operational land remote sensing activities and further provided for the development of a time-phased transition plan for transfer of the system first to the Department of Commerce and ultimately to the private sector. In June 1980, a "transition plan for civil operational land remote sensing from space" was published by the Department of Commerce which identified the actions required for implementing a fully operational land remote-sensing system from space, with the eventual goal of private sector ownership and operation of the system.

In early 1981 President Reagan deleted funding for additional Landsat satellites with the following justification: "The present NASA investment in Landsat is sufficient to permit evaluation of operational uses of Landsat data and, if these uses are cost-effective, to attract a private sector owner/operator." Since this time, deliberations have continued in the administration by the Cabinet Council on Commerce and Trade and the Department of Commerce.

As my colleagues are aware, the administration at one time proposed to transfer both weather satellites and land satellites to the private sector. I want to assure my colleagues that today we are dealing only with the transfer of land remote sensing systems and that a prohibition to the transfer of weather satellites is included in title VII of the bill before this body.

Mr. Speaker, this is an important piece of legislation. This legislation establishes a policy framework whereby the United States will continue to be a world leader in land remote-sensing technology. This data is used by several Federal departments, by State and local governments, by foreign governments including developing countries. The data is also used by universities and by many different industries. I urge my colleagues to support H.R. 5155.●

● Mr. McCURDY. Mr. Speaker, I rise in strong support of H.R. 5155. The bill reflects a sincere effort by the Science and Technology Committee to set clear, long-range plans for unlocking the potential of the Landsat data market, while shifting the cost burden from the shoulders of the Federal Government.

Last year, along with a majority of my colleagues, I opposed the transfer of weather satellites to private hands, and this bill specifically says that no portion of the weather satellite system may be commercialized. But, while 95 percent of the weather data is used by the Government, only about 25 percent of Landsat data is used by the Government. The rest is already being sold to private industry for use in agricultural forecasting and energy exploration. Unless Congress takes the initiative, the administration will allow this important program to go out of business as soon as 1987.

Some concerns have naturally arisen with respect to transferring the Landsat program, and I believe the bill adequately addresses each of these. In regard to technological leadership, NASA, NOAA, and other appropriate agencies, are required to continue advanced research and development of remote-sensing technology. Clearly, the bill does not remove the Federal Government from the Landsat program; it requires the Government to retain title to all data and equipment, while allowing the private sector to develop the marketing aspects. Without a strong commitment to a future Landsat program, we may very well lose our technological lead to other countries now steadily preparing to enter this field.

Under this bill, the Government remains involved and in control of remote-sensing technology, while taking advantage of the marketing know-how of the private sector. This approach should allow us to make best use of this vital data, and, at the same time, save money for the taxpayer.●

Mr. LUJAN. Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time, and I yield back the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Maryland (Mr. MITCHELL) will be recognized for 20 minutes and the gentleman from Nebraska (Mr. DAUB) will be recognized for 20 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. MITCHELL).

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on the bill under consideration.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maryland?

There was no objection.

Mr MITCHELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, in January of 1980, some 1,700 delegates assembled to hold a National Conference on Small Business in Washington. These delegates had been elected by the 25,000 fellow small businesses who previously attended 57 local conferences or had been appointed by elected officials.

After a weeklong conference, these delegates approved 60 recommendations. Of this number, the top 15 involved taxation, inflation, and regulation and were given top priority status by the conference.

The Small Business Committee promptly considered legislation, where necessary, to implement the recommendations. I am proud to report that subsequently enacted legislation included the Regulatory Flexibility Act, the Small Business Innovation Development Act, the Prompt Payment Act, and several procurement initiatives, as well as the inclusion of some of the tax recommendation in the Economic Recovery Tax Act.

I am also pleased to report that these measures are being used as models and legislation is being enacted in many States to deal with these subjects.

Mr. Speaker, next January, 5 years will have elapsed since the prior conference. I believe that after the election this year, it is time to convene another conference. Much was accomplished last time, but much more can be done. As a result, I introduced H.R. 5298, and I was joined by more than 50 other Members as cosponsors, including my ranking minority members, JOE MCDADE.

Very simply, this bill authorizes the President to hold a Small Business Conference between January 1, 1985, and September 1, 1986. This action would be preceded by State and regional conferences to elect delegates who would be joined in Washington by delegates appointed by the President, Members of Congress, and Governors. At the conclusion of the conference, a report with findings and recommendations would be made to the President and the Congress.

Mr. Speaker, this bill unanimously was endorsed by small business associations. It was approved on a bipartisan basis by the members of the Small Business Committee and I want to thank all of the committee members for their cooperation in facilitating expeditious consideration of this bill. I know of no opposition and I urge speedy passage of this measure.

Mr. DAUB. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of H.R. 5298 establishing a White House Conference on Small Business to be convened by the President sometime between January 1, 1985, and September 1, 1986.

I want to commend the chairman of our Small Business Committee, the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. MITCHELL) for the work that he has put into creating a very important piece of legislation that I think deserves and merits the support of all of our colleagues in the House.

Having attended the 1980 White House Conference on Small Business, I believe that it was indeed a great success. It called the attention of the President and the Congress to the special problems faced by small business owners in the areas of capital formation, minority business enterprise, innovation and technology, procurement, tax and Federal regulatory policies—just to name a few.

In the 4 years since that conference, as the chairman has just indicated, a number of pieces of legislation have come to fruition as a result of the recommendations of that conference. We have, as a matter of fact, accepted 11 of the 15 priority areas and ranked those issues accordingly. Those were the choices made by the delegates to that particular conference.

The conference was also important because it focused on the vital role played by the small business sector in the well-being of our American economy, and it particularly talked about ideas such as innovation, jobs creation, and generally regulated tax issues.

It is time to reassess the status of small business. This bill sets in motion the mechanism whereby small business owners across this country can meet at State and regional levels to discuss and offer solutions to problems which concern them. These grassroots proposals will be brought by elected delegates to this White House Conference where an agenda for possible legislative action will again be developed.

The passage of this legislation will provide a tremendous service to the small business community, and will underscore our commitment to its success. I urge my colleagues to support H.R. 5298.

Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

□ 1250

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to our distinguished colleague, the gentleman from Arizona (Mr. MCNULTY).

Mr. MCNULTY. I thank the gentleman for yielding this time to me.

Mr. Speaker, small business is the infantry of American capitalism, and that is the place where any recovery that deeply affects the future well-being of this country is going first to occur. That is the place where the new jobs will be generated, that is the place where a breakthrough will be announced that the matters that have been troubling our economy in past years are no longer with us.

Our economy is changing, though, and it is becoming increasingly complex, which means that small businesses face obstacles and opportunities that were not around 10 years ago. The Federal Government especially, given the size of its budget, has got to be responsive to the changing demands of small business.

Last February, in Tucson, Ariz., a conference was held to assist small businesses in Federal procurement. The thirst for this effort is revealed by the fact that over 500 people paid $12 each to come and hear for 2 days from people representative of the whole range of Federal governmental activities. All of them qualified for the designation of small business. As of today, five of the people who attended those conferences have received Government contracts, and that kind of cooperation between Government and small business needs to be nurtured. It is good for small business, it is good for the Federal Government, and it is good, most of all, for our sense of well-being.

Mr. Speaker, numerous economic profiles and projections point to the role that small businesses will continue to play as the Nation's primary job creator. As legislators, we need to understand the role and function of our Nation's small businesses and be responsive to that vital sector of our economy. Heightened awareness of the problems and contributions of small business is necessary to identify the executive and legislative action that is needed.

So the bill that we are considering today addresses that need in a most appropriate way, and I urge my colleagues to vote for its passage.

● Mr. ROTH. Mr. Speaker, there is no doubt that 1983 was a positive year in terms of economic growth in this country. The gross national product rose 6.1 percent from the fourth quarter of 1982 through the fourth quarter of 1983. Unemployment declined 2.5 percent from 1982 to 1983. Business bankruptcies were reduced by 30 percent in the last half of 1983 as compared to the previous year and the inflation rate remained relatively low at 4.2 percent annually.

Nowhere was the year more economically encouraging than in the small business sector where statistics emphatically show that America is indeed on the road to a prosperous economic future.

As reported in the President's Report on the State of Small Business, employment in small business-dominated industries grew 2.6 percent from September of 1982 through September 1983. Furthermore, small business income grew 18 percent during 1983, as measured by changes in proprietorship and partnership income.

Small businesses produced a total of 2,650,000 new jobs. These jobs were in small businesses particularly aimed at finance, mining, and service.

With such overwhelming statistics it is our role as Members of Congress to promote continued improvement within the small business sector as means to expand our economic horizons. For this reason I urge my colleagues to adopt H.R. 5298, which would provide for a White House Conference on Small Business.

This Conference, as indicated by a similar undertaking in 1980, will vastly increase the public's awareness of the large role small business plays in the economics of America. This Conference will help to identify the difficulties facing small business and spur innovative solutions to overcome such difficulties. Furthermore, the White House Conference will examine the ever-increasing role of women and minorities in small businesses and aid in the development of future small business endeavors by women and minorities.

It should be noted that conferences such as the one proposed have been highly successful and productive. Recently, in my own State of Wisconsin, the Small Business Administration in conjunction with the University of Wisconsin, held a Federal procurement seminar for small businesses. I am pleased to say that over 700 small businesses represented attended and were informed on how they may be eligible for federally awarded contracts.

In addition, it must be said that on top of being the heartbeat of the American economy, the small business workplace is becoming the center of the social environment for a large portion of America's population. As an ever-increasing proportion of married women enter the work force, small businesses are becoming focal on social development.

Small businesses are where people experience authority directly and learn the fulfillment of collective action. The shop floor, the loading dock, and the office are where the values of equity, security, and participation are most ultimately discovered. In a real sense, the business community is replacing the geographic community as the most tangible America social setting. People generally identify with where they work rather than where they live.

Therefore a White House Conference on Small Business would be most beneficial as it would enable the small business interest to examine ideas of economic growth as well as the overall environment of the workplace.

I commend the chairman of the Small Business Committee on the development of this legislation and urge my colleagues to support H.R. 5298, as it is just one more needed tool to insure the continued economic well-being of this country.●

● Mr. CONTE. Mr. Speaker, I support H.R. 5298, which authorizes funds for a White House Conference on Small Business. This Conference is a follow-up to the very successful White House Conference of 1980. That Conference resulted in recommendations which Congress has developed into laws which are common small business terms today. Some examples are the Prompt Payment Act, the Equal Access to Justice Act, and the Small Business Innovation Act.

Mr. Speaker, as a member of the Small Business Committee for 25 years, I can attest to the need for these conferences. Small business is responsible for 38 percent of our gross national product, and employs 47.8 percent of the private nonfarm sector work force. Small business created 2,650,000 new jobs between 1980 and 1982, offsetting by 984,000 the 1,644,000 jobs lost by big business. A powerful economic force like this needs to be heard by the highest levels of the Federal Government. This Conference is an ideal vehicle for that hearing.

I urge my colleagues to support H.R. 5298, to hold a White House Conference on Small Business.●

● Mr. CORRADA. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of H.R. 5298, a bill to provide for a White House Conference on Small Business.

A similar Conference to the one being voted on today was held in 1980. It consisted of a series of State and regional meetings which culminated in a National Conference here in Washington. A series of specific recommendations resulted from this Conference of which many have been adopted. The recommendations covered a large spectrum of topics affecting small business: Energy, minority business development, inflation, interest rates, and new technologies.

This proposal to authorize the President to conduct another Conference has the support of the delegates to the original Conference in 1980. I am proud to be a cosponsor of a bill which will provide a forum for representatives of the small businesses of America to express their concerns in a vast array of topics.

It is important to remember that over 98 percent of the businesses of this country are classified as small businesses. They employ 47.8 percent of the nongovernmental, nonagricultural work force. Small businesses generate 42 percent of the sales in the United States and comprise a healthy 38 percent of GNP.

The bill calls for consideration of various issues of vital importance to small businesses in Puerto Rico: The Conference will assist small businesses in carrying out its role as the Nation's job creator; our State currently suffers from an unemployment rate of over 20 percent; the Conference will examine the status of minorities and women as small business owners, most small businesses in Puerto Rico fall into one of these categories.

At a time when our Nation appears to be moving back toward economic health, the small business contribution to economic recovery must be recognized and supported.

I urge my colleagues to approve this bill unanimously to demonstrate our support for such a vital part of our economy, the small business community.●

●Mr. LAFALCE. mr. Speaker, I rise in support of H.R. 5298, a bill which authorizes the second White House Conference on Small Business.

I think that most of us would agree that the 1980 White House Conference on Small Business was an overwhelming success, especially because it established a national agenda for small business. As a result, more than half of the 60 recommendations from the Conference have been acted upon by Congress over the past 3 years.

In the area of procurement reform, for example, Congress has passed and the President has signed into law the Small Business Innovation Development Act of which I was the primary author. This act provides that small firms receive a fixed minimum percentage of research and development awards made by Federal agencies. Since the enactment of this law in 1982, over 760 research and development awards have gone to small business, totaling nearly $44.5 million. In fiscal year 1984, the awards should rise to $110 million.

It is my strong belief that there should be the broadest possible participation in the second White House Conference on Small Business. The Conference will provide the opportunity for concerned individuals and organizations to discuss issues and problems confronting small business, and to develop solutions to those problems. As a means of furthering this objective, the bill calls for a conference in each State open to all small business representatives. The selection process for the national Conference will primarily consist of the election of delegates at the State conferences. A set number of delegates will be selected by the President, Senators, Members of Congress, and State Governors. This process will insure input from a large number of members from the business community. Over 1,700 individuals participated in the 1980 Conference.

My expectations for the second Small Business Conference are high. The 1980 Conference provided a tremendous service to small business not only by focusing national attention on the needs of small business, but also by helping them to give priority to their objectives.

Although many of the recommendations from the last Conference have been acted upon, there are still a number of issues which need to be addressed in the national forum provided by a White House Conference setting. Renewed debate is needed in such areas as tax and capital formation, regulatory reform, and women and minorities in business, to name a few. Now is the time to widen the scope of discussion to include new issues and direct the debate toward long-range economic planning—not only as it pertains to domestic policies, but with an eye toward world trade and finance: all major factors which affect the climate for the growth of small business in our country. I would also suggest that the Conference be used as the vehicle for promoting discussion on how to direct capital into the business community and the effect on the ability of smaller firms to survive.

A second White House Conference on Small Business is the key for providing continuity to small business participation in the decisions made by Congress and the administrative agencies which effect our small business community. Therefore, I urge the support of my colleagues for this important bill.●

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. Speaker, I have no further request for time, and I yield back the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. MITCHELL) that the House suspend the rules and pass the bill, H.R. 5298, as amended.

The question was taken; and (two-thirds having voted in favor thereof) the rules were suspended and the bill, as amended, was passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

LONGSHOREMEN'S AND HARBOR WORKERS' COMPENSATION ACT

Mr. MILLER of California. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the Senate bill (S. 38) entitled the "Longshoremen's and Harbor Workers' Compensation Act," as amended.

The Clerk read the Senate bill, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That (a) this Act may be cited as the "Longshoremen's and Harbor Workers' Compensation Act Amendments of 1983".

(b) Except as otherwise specifically provided, whenever in this Act an amendment or repeal is expressed in terms of an amendment to, or repeal of, a section or other provision, the reference shall be considered to be made to a section or other provision of the Longshoremen's and Harbor Workers' Compensation Act.

DEFINITIONS

SEC. 2. (a) Section 2(3) is amended to read as follows:

"(3)(A) The term 'employee' means any person engaged in maritime employment, including any longshoreman or other person engaged in longshoring operations, and any harbor-worker including a ship repairman, shipbuilder, and shipbreaker, but such term does not include—

"(i) individuals employed exclusively to perform office clerical, secretarial, security, or data processing work;

"(ii) individuals employed by a club, camp, or recreational operation;

"(iii) individuals employed by a restaurant, museum, retail outlet, or marina and who are not engaged in construction, replacement, or expansion of such facilities (except for routine maintenance);

"(iv) individuals who (I) are employed by suppliers, transporters, or vendors, (II) are temporarily doing business on the premises of an employer described in paragraph (4), and (III) are not engaged in work normally performed by employees of that employer under this Act;

"(v) aquaculture workers;

"(vi) a master or member of a crew of any vessel;

"(vii) any person engaged by a master to load or unload or repair any small vessel under eighteen tons net; or

"(viii) individuals who are engaged in work on land involving the fabrication of platforms intended, while fixed to the seabed, to be used in connection with energy or mineral extraction, subject to subparagraph (B);

if individuals described in clauses (i) through (iv) are subject to coverage under a State workers' compensation law.

"(B)(i) The exclusion authorized by clause (viii) of subparagraph (A) may be granted only pursuant to a finding on the record by the Secretary of Labor, based on an evaluation of all pertinent records or materials which the Secretary may require, that the additional cost resulting from the coverage of such workers under this Act, in and of itself, will result in the loss of a contract for the construction of such a platform to a foreign bidder which is not subject to this Act and in the resultant loss of jobs for American workers.

"(ii) An exclusion under this subparagraph may be granted on the decision of the Secretary of Labor on an annual basis for a period not to exceed one year or the duration of a contract already in effect, whichever is longer. The decision to grant such an exclusion may be appealed, within 30 days, to the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit and may not be executed until any such appeal has been completed.

"(B) Physicians and health care providers shall be included on the list of those not authorized to provide medical care and medical services pursuant to subparagraph (A) when the Secretary determines under this section, in accordance with the procedures provided in subsection (j), that such physician or health care provider—

"(i) has knowingly and willfully made, or caused to be made, any false statement or misrepresentation of a material fact for use in a claim for compensation or claim for reimbursement of medical expenses under this Act;

"(ii) has knowingly and willfully submitted, or caused to be submitted, a bill or request for payment under this Act containing a charge which the Secretary finds to be substantially in excess of the charge for the service, appliance, or supply prevailing within the community, unless the Secretary finds there is good cause for the bill or request containing the charge;

"(2) Whenever the employer or carrier acquires knowledge of the employee's injury, through written notice or otherwise as prescribed by the Act, the employer or carrier shall forthwith authorize medical treatment and care from a physician selected by an employee pursuant to subsection (b). In all other cases, consent may be given upon a showing of good cause for change.".

(b) Section 7(d) is amended to read as follows:

"(d) An employee shall not be entitled to recover any amount expended by him for medical or other treatment or services unless he shall have complied with subsections (b) and (c) and the applicable regulations or unless the employer shall have refused or neglected to furnish such services, or unless the nature of the injury required such treatment and services and the employer or his superintendent or foreman having knowledge of such injury shall have neglected to provide or authorize same; nor shall any claim for medical or surgical treatment be valid and enforceable against such employer, unless within twenty-one days following the first treatment the physician giving such treatment furnishes to the employer and the deputy commissioner a report of such injury or treatment, on a form prescribed by the Secretary. The Secretary may excuse the failure to furnish such report within the twenty-one-day period whenever he finds it to be in the interest of justice to do so. The Secretary may, upon application by a party in interest, make an award for the reasonable value of such medical or surgical treatment so obtained by the employee. If at any time the employee unreasonably refuses to submit to medical or surgical treatment, or to an examination by a physician selected by the employer, the Secretary or administrative law judge may, by order, suspend the payment of further compensation during such time as such refusal continues, and no compensation shall be paid at any time during the period of such suspension, unless the circumstances justified the refusal.".

(c) Section 7 is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(j)(1) The Secretary shall have the authority to make rules and regulations and to establish procedures, not inconsistent with the provisions of this Act, which are necessary or appropriate to carry out the provisions of subsection (c), including the nature and extent of the proof and evidence necessary for actions under this section and the methods of taking and furnishing such proof and evidence.

The Secretary shall provide notice of these findings and an opportunity for a hearing pursuant to section 556 of title 5, United States Code, for a provider who would be affected by a decision under this section. A request for a hearing must be filed with the Secretary within thirty days after notice of the findings is received by the provider making such request. If a hearing is held, the Secretary shall, on the basis of evidence adduced at the hearing, affirm, modify, or reverse the findings of fact and proposed action under this section.

Such action shall be brought in the court of appeals of the United States for the judicial circuit in which the plaintiff resides or has his principal place of business, or the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia. As part of his answer, the Secretary shall file a certified copy of the transcript of the record of the hearing, including all evidence submitted in connection therewith. The findings of fact of the Secretary, if based on substantial evidence in the record as a whole, shall be conclusive.".

"(k)(1) Nothing in this Act prevents an employee whose injury or disability has been established under this Act from relying in good faith on treatment by prayer or spiritual means alone, in accordance with the tenets and practice of a recognized church or religious denomination, by an accredited practitioner of such recognized church or religious denomination, and on nursing services rendered in accordance with such tenets and practice, without suffering loss or diminution of the compensation benefits under this Act. Nothing in this subsection shall be construed to except an employee from all physical examinations required by this Act.

"(2) If an employee refuses to submit to medical or surgical services solely because, in adherence to the tenets and practice of a recognized church or religious denomination, the employee relies upon prayer or spiritual means alone for healing, such employee shall not be considered to have unreasonably refused medical or surgical treatment under subsection (d) or to have unreasonably refused to undergo physical rehabilitation.".

Loss of both hands, both arms, both feet, both legs, both eyes, or any combination of two such body parts, shall constitute permanent total disability in the absence of conclusive proof to the contrary. In all other cases, permanent total disability shall be determined in accordance with the facts.".

(b) Section 8(c)(13) is amended to read as follows:

"(13) Loss of hearing:

"(ii) The time for filing a notice of injury, under section 12 of this Act, or a claim for compensation, under section 13 of this Act, shall not begin to run in connection with any claim for loss of hearing under this section, until the employee has been provided with an audiogram, with the accompanying report thereon, which indicates that the employee has suffered a loss of hearing.

Failure of the employer to provide a copy of such request for apportionment shall be an absolute defense to the special fund's liability for the payment of any benefits in connection with such claim, if the Secretary denies the liability of the special fund in connection with such claim. Failure to notify the Secretary pursuant to this paragraph shall not be a bar to subsequent apportionment of liability to the special fund if the Secretary determines that the employer could not have reasonably anticipated the liability of the special fund.".

(g) Subsections (h) and (i) of section 8 are amended to read as follows:

"(h) The wage-earning capacity of an injured employee in cases of disability shall be determined by his actual earnings if such actual earnings fairly and reasonably represent his wage-earning capacity. If the employee has no actual earnings or his actual earnings do not fairly and reasonably represent his wage-earning capacity, the deputy commissioner may, in the interest of justice, fix such wage-earning capacity as shall be reasonable, having due regard to the nature of his injury, the degree of physical impairment, his usual employment, and any other factors or circumstances in the case which may affect his capacity to earn wages in his disabled condition.

"(i)(1) Whenever the parties to any claim for compensation, including survivors benefits, under this Act agree to a settlement, the deputy commissioner or administrative law judge shall approve the settlement within thirty days unless it is found to be inadequate or procured by duress. No liability of any employer, carrier, or both for disability or death benefits shall be discharged unless the application for settlement is approved by the deputy commissioner or administrative law judge. If the parties to the settlement are represented by counsel, then agreements shall be deemed approved unless specifically disapproved within thirty days after submission for approval.

"(2) If the deputy commissioner disapproves an application for settlement under paragraph (1), the deputy commissioner shall issue a written statement within thirty days containing the reasons for disapproval. Any party to the settlement may request a hearing before an administrative law judge in the manner prescribed by this Act. Following such hearing, the administrative law judge shall enter an order approving or rejecting the settlement.

"(3) A settlement approved under this section shall discharge the liability of the employer, carrier, or both. Such settlement may include future medical benefits if the parties so agree and the deputy commissioner approves. Settlements may be agreed upon at any stage of the proceeding including after entry of a final compensation order.".

(h) Section 8 is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(B) knowingly and willfully omits or understates any part of such earnings, and who is determined by the deputy commissioner to have violated clause (A) or (B) of this paragraph, forfeits his right to compensation with respect to any period during which the employee was required to file such report.

"(B) the remainder of such excess shall be retained by the employee and credited against future payments of compensation and medical benefits to the employee pursuant to this Act.".

(c) Section 33(g) is amended to read as follows:

"(g)(1) If the person entitled to compensation (or the person's representative) enters into a settlement with a third person referred to in subsection (a) for an amount less than the compensation to which the person (or the person's representative) would be entitled under this Act, the employer shall be liable for compensation as determined under subsection (f) only if written approval of the settlement is obtained from the employer and the employer's carrier, before the settlement is executed, and by the person entitled to compensation (or the person's representative). The approval shall be made on a form provided by the Secretary and shall be filed in the office of the deputy commissioner within thirty days after the settlement is entered into.

"(2) If no written approval of the settlement is obtained and filed as required by paragraph (1), or if the employee fails to notify the employer of any settlement obtained from or judgment rendered against a third person, all rights to compensation and medical benefits under this Act shall be terminated, regardless of whether the employer or the employer's insurer has made payments or acknowledged entitlement to benefits under this Act.

"(3) Any payments by the special fund established under section 44 shall be a lien upon the proceeds of any settlement obtained from or judgment rendered against a third person referred to under subsection (a). Notwithstanding any other provision of law, such lien shall be enforceable against the employee or employer, regardless of whether the Secretary on behalf of the special fund has agreed to or has received actual notice of the settlement or judgment.".

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. MILLER of California. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on the Senate bill presently under consideration, S. 38.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. MILLER of California. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, this legislation addresses several statutory, fiscal, and operational problems which affect the compensation of workers in maritime employment.

This legislation is the product of several years of work by the Subcommittee on Labor Standards, the Education and Labor Committee of the House, and the Senate Labor and Human Resources Committee. I am pleased that the bill which is before the House today has enjoyed the support of minority members of the committee, and I would like to extend my appreciation to the ranking member of the Education and Labor Committee, the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. ERLENBORN, for his efforts to assure passage of this bill.

Since the passage of the last Longshore Act Amendments in 1972, ambiguity has arisen concerning certain aspects of the act. Serious questions have been raised about the precise coverage intended by the Congress, particularly with respect to small, recreational marinas and yards and certain workers performing nonmaritime tasks in proximity to the navigable waterways.

These ambiguities have resulted in substantial actuarial and underwriting uncertainties for insurers, and have raised concerns among workers and their representatives about the adequacy of the compensation provided under the act.

One of the key goals of this legislation, therefore, is to assure that all of those who are truly deserving of compensation receive adequate and timely benefits.

As reported by the Education and Labor Committee, S. 38 achieves this goal by excluding from coverage workers who are not engaged in maritime occupations, or who are not exposed to maritime hazards even though they may be employed by maritime employers.

While this exclusion must be read very narrowly, as the committee report notes, the legislation is intended to exclude men or women engaged entirely in office clerical, secretarial, security, or data processing work, but only if that worker's responsibilities do not ever extend to labor performed on piers, wharves, or warehouses.

This exemption also extends to many workers employed by restaurants, museums, and marinas who are not employed in maritime activities, although the exclusion would not extend to employees of those businesses who are engaged in the construction, replacement, or expansion of those facilities.

I would like to direct the attention of the House to both the text of the legislation and to the committee report, No. 98-570, in which the precise extent of these exclusions are detailed. Since the issue of coverage has been one of the key areas of dispute since the 1972 amendments were enacted, the committee has spoken very clearly so as to reduce any possible future confusion.

Two amendments have been added by the committee since S. 38 was reported. I would like to take a moment to explain these amendments since they are not included in the committee's report.

On page 6 of the reported bill, we have deleted section 4(a), which established this law as the exclusive remedy for workers eligible for compensation under the Longshore Act. Deletion of this section leaves current law in place, which permits a worker his or her choice of filing under the Federal or applicable State laws, which is preferable both to substantial portions of the industry and the representatives of labor organization.

The committee also has included an amendment which would allow the Secretary of Labor, upon a finding on the record, to waive coverage for a period of 1 year of "individuals engaged on land in the fabrication of platforms intended, while fixed to the seabed, to be used in connection with energy or mineral extraction."

This exemption is strictly conditioned upon a finding by the Secretary that the application of the Longshore Act "in and of itself will result in the loss of a contract for the construction of such a platform to a foreign bidder which is not subject to this Act and in the resultant loss of jobs for American workers."

This amendment addresses a situation which arose subsequent to the committee's action on S. 38. Several recent cases in the fifth circuit concluded that the Longshore Act coverage included workers engaged on land in the fabrication of platforms for offshore oil and gas development. Representatives of some of the industries engaged in fabrication of these platforms contend that the additional costs which may be associated with Longshore coverage would have the effect of making American-built platforms noncompetitive with foreign bidders in this unique and highly specialized field.

The loss of these multimillion dollar platforms would obviously compound the problems facing the domestic steel industry and its thousands of underemployed or unemployed workers.

It is the intent of the committee to permit that industry to make its case to the Secretary—not a case that the industry is in trouble, or that foreign competition is underbidding U.S. industries; we all know that those are true. Rather, we have crafted a very narrow exemption whereby the Secretary "may" waive longshore coverage if he determines that the additional costs associated with higher compensation costs, in and of themselves, would result in the loss of a contract and the loss of American jobs to a foreign bidder. While this is a rigorous test, the industry has assured me repeatedly that it can prove that such losses will occur.

Since the steel industry is in a very precarious state, and since we do not intend to reopen the Longshore Act for amendment in the near future, this conditional waiver seems appropriate, although I must add that the industry has not yet provided clear and convincing evidence to me which would justify an exemption under the terms of this amendment. Nevertheless, if it can do so, I believe it is acceptable to permit such a narrow exemption for this unique industry.

Naturally, none of the exemptions which I have detailed would apply unless an injured worker remains covered by State compensation in the absence of Longshore Act coverage.

S. 38 also amends section 6(b)(1) of the Longshore Act to limit death benefits to a maximum of 200 percent of the national average weekly wage on the date of death. This bill eliminates one of the most severely criticized benefits afforded under the 1972 amendments—the unrelated death benefit—and limits annual cost-of-living increases to no more than 5 percent.

The committee bill also makes certain changes in the handling of hearing losses to establish that an audiogram should be presumptive evidence of a hearing loss if administered by a licensed or certified specialist.

However, we do not suggest that any worker be required to submit to a hearing test administered by an employer. In addition, the committee has rejected the Senate bill's provision holding an employer responsible only for that hearing loss suffered while in that particular employment. This concept is antithetical to the very nature of workers' compensation law, and has no place in this legislation.

Mr. Speaker, one of the most important provisions of the House bill addresses the very serious problem of claims due to injuries attributable to occupational diseases.

As I stated at the outset of my remarks, our goal is to assure that all truly eligible workers receive just compensation for the disabilities under the Longshore Act. Like most worker compensation laws, however, the Longshore Act was conceived in an era where disabilities were generally traumatic, and evident almost immediately upon their occurrence.

We now know, however, that a great many disabilities do not manifest themselves for long periods of time after the initial injury is suffered. In some cases, the latency period for these occupationally related diseases can be years, or even decades. Yet the notice and statute of limitation provisions of the Longshore Act are not designed, at present, to accommodate such claims. Under current law, notice of an injury must be given within 30 days, and a claim for compensation must be filed within 1 year. Workers attempting to secure benefits for injuries which occurred years before have found the system unresponsive to their claims in many cases.

S. 38 addresses the problem of occupational disease compensation by eliminating the notice requirement, and tolling the statute of limitations until the disability has impaired the workers functional capacity, or has resulted in a loss of wages.

The committee bill also specifically rejects the decision of the Benefits Review Board in Dunn against Todd Shipyard by establishing the basis for computing compensation in a disease case as the last wage prior to the onset of disability, regardless of whether that wage was earned in "covered employment." Our bill also permits a rate based on the national average weekly wage at the time of disability onset in the case of a worker not employed fully at the time of, or immediately prior to, the onset of the disability.

Mr. Speaker, this section of S. 38 is among its most important provisions. This legislation removes from coverage those who are not deserving of its coverage because they are not truly engaged in maritime occupations. By the same token, those who are disabled by those covered jobs must not be precluded from compensation benefits because of outmoded statute of limitation requirements, or denied adequate benefits because the system fails to recognize that we are dealing with a developing, but very significant, new aspect of the worker compensation issue.

Mr. Speaker, this legislation also contains numerous provisions to improve the operations of the longshore system. S. 38, as reported by the Education and Labor Committee, allows the Secretary of Labor to publish a list of medical practitioners who are disqualified from rendering medical care or providing services under this act. The bill also allows the Secretary to disqualify claimant's representatives for engaging in fraud in connection with the making of a claim under any Workers' Compensation Act, for reasons of professional conduct, and for other reasons.

The committee's bill also increases other penalty provisions of the law by making them consistent with those Federal criminal penalties for misrepresentation in the United States Code (18 U.S.C. 1001).

Our bill also makes changes in the operations of the Benefits Review Board to expedite the processing of case backlogs, in order to assure prompt and adequate compensation to eligible workers and their survivors, which is one of the key goals of this legislation.

The legislation also makes changes in the special fund. By limiting an employer's potential liability for a partially injured worker whom he hired, the special fund was intended to encourage employers to hire partially disabled workers.

Under current law the employer pays the first 2 years of compensation for a subsequent injury, and then passes along the remaining compensation costs to the fund. However honorable in intent, this section has resulted in the misuse of the fund and in additional costs to employers whose liabilities to the fund have grown far beyond reason.

In fiscal 1976, special fund disbursements were about $3 million. Just 6 years later, those disbursements had grown over sevenfold to nearly $24 million. The committee bill addresses this excessive utilization of the special fund by extending the period of time from which the actual employer would retain sole compensation responsibility from 2 to 6 years.

We have also corrected the circumstances by which about 1,500 current special fund cases have become the partial responsibility of the Federal Government. The committee bill terminates Federal responsibility for any new claims—estimated by CBO at about 30 per year—and accepts all responsibility for the 1,500 claims filed prior to enactment of this legislation. While this provision would increase Federal costs in the short term, the elimination of Federal responsibility for any of the new claims will result in the steady diminution of Federal costs over time.

Mr. Speaker, this complex legislation represents the work of many different parties who are all committed to the improvement of the Longshore Act, to the reduction in unnecessary and unjustified costs for employers and the Federal taxpayer, and the assurance that eligible workers will receive appropriate compensation for disabilities.

We have a coalition in support of this legislation, but it is in many ways a fragile consensus. In the last Congress, that coalition was fractured, and we lost an opportunity to enact this reform legislation. I am anxious that we not lose this opportunity, which may well be our last, to correct the shortcomings of the longshore program.

It would be my preference that the Senate take this legislation and approve it, thereby eliminating the need for a conference. If the Senate should not do so, we are certainly prepared to commit the House to the swift resolution of those areas of disagreement, recognizing, however, that our time is limited, and the ability to maintain the coalition in support of S. 38 is not without limitations.

On behalf of the majority, I would again like to express my appreciation to the gentleman from Illinois, the ranking minority member of the committee, Mr. ERLENBORN, for his cooperation and long-term interest in this legislation, and I will yield to him at this time.

Mr. ERLENBORN. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, at long last the House has before it legislation comprehensively amending the Longshoremen's and Harbor Workers' Compensation Act, probably the worst workers' compensation law in the Nation. It is one-third of that terrible trilogy of Federal workers' compensation adventures—the Black Lung Act and Federal Employees' Compensation Act being the other two. They are monuments to congressional and administrative malfeasance.

The Longshore Act was enacted in 1927, following a series of Supreme Court decisions holding that State workers' compensation laws could not constitutionally compensate maritime workers. The Court interpreted State attempts to compensate maritime workers as violating constitutional prescriptions assuring uniform interpretation of maritime law. Although the act has been amended numerous times, the most extensive and damaging were the 1972 amendments, drawn up literally in the dead of night at a now-infamous midnight meeting of Senate staffers, unions, and a few employers near the end of the 92d Congress.

It is unclear to this day who knew what at that meeting, but the result is clear—a legislative disaster par excellence.

The amendments moved jurisdiction inland from the water's edge to uncertain adjoining areas, significantly raised benefits and tied future increases to annual increases in the national average weekly wage, failed to impose any percentage cap on death benefits, and provided survivor benefits even if the employee dies of causes unrelated to employment.

These changes overlayed other provisions in the act which, together, further aggravated insurability and converted a workers' compensation program into a new form of social welfare.

Employers and insurers have not been the only parties critical of the 1972 amendments. Even the Federal judiciary has had harsh words. The Chief Justice termed the act "* * * about as unclear as any statute could be * * *" Justice Brennan referred to it as a "jurisdictional monstrosity."

Meanwhile employer costs have soared.

In New York premiums for stevedoring rose from $29.90 per $100 of payroll in 1972 to over $87 today. That translates into over $21,000 in premiums for each employee—more than most families earn in a year.

High east coast longshore costs have contributed to diversion of cargo to Canadian ports where stevedoring rates are a fraction of U.S. rates.

Until recently, the Longshore Act covered private employers in the District of Columbia. There the experience has also been disastrous.

Metro subway construction has been far more expensive because of longshore, with compensation payments running almost $2 million per mile completed or under construction;

On a subject with special interest to this body, workers' compensation costs for the new Hart Senate Office Building were over $14 million out of a total construction cost of $110 million. A national average of workers' compensation costs would translate into only $4.5 million or a whopping 68 percent less than longshore. One wonders where our Senate colleagues would have wanted to put an extra $10 million.

These are only a few examples of the terribly excessive costs of longshore, largely the product of the 1972 amendments.

The act has also proven to be an extortionist's lode. The Senate Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations, following a lengthy investigation of waterfront corruption, recommended amendments to the act.

It stated:

As we have heard, that act has been abused by identified members of organized crime and by their labor racketeering associates to induce fraudulent workmen's compensation claims to the point that they can actually put companies out of business. Fraudulent claims can be used as economic extortion to generate payoffs from businessmen who cannot afford to pay the consequences of this racket.

In this respect, the subcommittee should give serious consideration to making recommendations concerning the provisions of that act which speak to the ability of the ILA (International Longshoreman's Association) to engage certain unscrupulous physicians and attorneys to process these claims.

We also firmly believe that the act should be tightened to such an extent that it cannot be misused or abused by organized crime and labor racketeers to create a tool of economic extortion.

To this end, the subcommittee's just-issued report on "Waterfront Corruption" specifically endorses provisions of Senate-passed S. 38 pertaining to employee physician selection procedures, the act's presumption of coverage, and the penalty for misrepresentation.

The report's findings and recommendations will be included in the RECORD following my statement.

In addition to jurisdiction, lack of insurability, high costs, and fraud, other deficiencies in the act have developed:

Further attacks on the employer's exclusive liability for longshore benefits, in lieu of other liability, particularly in the shipbuilding industry;

Exponentially increasing liabilities of the special fund, as the act's high costs gave employers incentives to seek fund relief in so-called second injury cases and, thus, spread their individual losses across the rest of the maritime industry;

Procedural problems involving delayed settlement approvals; and

The growing Longshore and Black Lung Act case backlog at the Benefits Review Board.

Mr. Speaker, both the Senate-passed bill and the committee's amendment address these problems.

First, jurisdiction is clarified to some extent, though not to the degree I would prefer, by carving out specific areas not contemplated by the 1972 amendments. Those include recreational boatbuilding and repairing and other miscellaneous recreational operations; office clerical, secretarial, security, and data processing activities, and aquaculture operations, and under most circumstances, clubs, camps, floating restaurants, museums, retail outlets, and marinas. Also exempted are employees of suppliers, transporters, or vendors temporarily on the premises of a longshore employer;

Second, insurability will be fostered by placing a 5 percent cap on the annual benefit escalator, capping death benefits at twice the national average weekly wage, repealing unrelated death benefits, and clarifying jurisdiction;

Third, fraud is dealt with by giving the Labor Department authority to debar the unscrupulous doctors and lawyers, raising the penalty for misrepresentation from a misdemeanor to a felony, and prohibiting employees from using a physician on the Secretary's debarment list;

Fourth, exclusivity is reinforced for shipbuilders by making Longshore Act benefits the exclusive workers' compensation remedy for shipbuilding employees and their employer's exclusive workers' compensation liability by prohibiting tort actions against shipbuilding employers on some dual capacity theory;

Fifth, a means to expedite settlements is provided;

Sixth, the special fund's problem is addressed, however inadequately; and Seventh, the Benefits Review Board membership is augmented.

By agreement between the gentleman from California and myself, the bill no longer includes an amendment to section 5(a) of the act which purported to reinforce the rule that an employee's longshore benefits are exclusive of all other workers' compensation or Jones Act benefits. Identical language is included in the Senate bill and in our committee's reported amendment to S. 38. However, in retrospect questions have been raised about the effectivenss of the language, as well as the wisdom of this change, to which the gentleman from California and I have not received satisfactory answers. Therefore, by striking the provision here, we are able to preserve the issue for conference.

So far, Mr. Speaker, I have dwelled on the positive aspects of this bill, but there are elements I either do not support or provisions deleted by the gentleman from California (Mr. MILLER) to which he had formerly agreed. I want to discuss some of these changes to our agreement but first comment on the history of this legislation.

In July 1982 the Senate passed S. 1182, a comprehensive revision to the Longshore Act and, itself, the product of long, arduous negotiations. House consideration should have been expeditious but organized labor, which had agreed to the Senate bill, would no longer endorse it. It, as well as the gentleman from California, raised innumerable objections to the Senate bill. Issues which had been resolved were reopened and new issues sprouted like June weeds. Nevertheless, an agreement was reached in December 1982 only to have our late colleague, Phillip Burton, object. The agreement was stillborn.

This year, in order to get a bill to the House, the Senate in effect repassed S. 1182—as S. 38. We were told the committee would soon turn its attention to longshore. And the agreement? Now there were new concerns, and we were told, still further changes would have to be made.

Thus, there are numerous differences between this bill and the December 1982 agreement which, had it been observed, would now obviate our need for a conference.

First, the exemption was struck for land-based fabrication of certain commercial barges, tugboats, and other sundry vessels. Apparently, the cost of longshore would still be so high, even with these amendments, that employers do not believe they can compete for nonmaritime work with employers who fabricate solely nonmaritime work and are not covered by the act. The maritime fabrication industry today is severely depressed.

In this connection, a coalition of offshore oil platform fabricating companies have urged that landside fabrication work be excluded from the act, because longshore's high costs have made domestic fabricators competitive with foreign fabricators.

According to an economic analysis, longshore raises unit labor costs for fabrication 9 percent in Louisiana, 5 percent in Texas, and 8 percent in Mississippi. The resultant overall increase in project cost is within the range between the winning foreign bid and the next lowest bid, no longshore costs, this report concludes, spell the difference between an American firm or foreign firm winning the bid. Since 1979, of 10 contracts awarded in the west coast platform market, 1 has been won by an American company, 6 by the Japanese, 1 by Korea, and 2 by Malaysian entities of American firms.

The loss of 9 projects accounts for 4 million man-hours and 90,000 metric tons of steel. Since 1978, one-third of the platform fabrication work force has been laid off.

Now, I understand the gentleman from California has been working with the fabricators to fashion an appropriate remedy and trust that some accommodation will be reached in conference. It appears to me jobs are at stake.

Mr. Speaker, the economic analysis of the fabrication industry will be placed in the RECORD following my remarks.

Second, the substitute offered by the gentleman from California deletes language in our agreement establishing a Conservation Committee in the Labor Department to protect the assets of the special fund. Currently, no one guards the fund, although nominally the Secretary could. The result is that employers and claimants can stipulate fund coverage and often no one questions the factual claims. Moreover, once a case enters the fund, no one monitors it to assure the employee is still disabled or otherwise eligible for benefits. The cases simply are lost.

To illustrate my point, there is the case of a former longshoreman who suffered successive back injuries which rendered him permanently and totally disabled in 1975. Because the injuries were aggravating, the employer qualified for special fund relief, whereby he paid 2 years' compensation, with the fund paying the rest through an annual assessment on all insurers and self-insured employers.

Today, this man is still supposedly permanently totally disabled, although he enjoys water sports, tennis, and snow skiing. In 1983 the special fund paid him over $25,000 in benefits, tax free.

This is a classic case of why the fund needs to be better protected.

Better protection of the fund—that is, addressing its escalating liabilities—is why both the Senate bill and the House amendment increase the employer's retention period on a fund case. The gentleman knows, however, another dimension of this same issue is the misallocation of liabilities within the fund among insurers and self-insured employers. I hope the gentleman would agree in conference we will refine our response to the fund's problem, perhaps by altering the formula on which the Secretary bases the annual fund assessment.

Third, our agreement had provided the judges of the Benefits Review Board terms of office with removal only for cause. Currently, the members serve for undefined terms at the pleasure of the Secretary. I would hope that all of us could agree that assuring the integrity of the review process serves everyone's interests.

Fourth, the bill before us eliminates our understandings concerning vocational rehabilitation which would have preserved benefits for employees undergoing vocational rehabilitation but prevented premature entry of permanent total awards, and mandated such rehabilitation.

Last, the bill alters our agreement regarding the basis on which occupational disease benefits are determined which raises unanswered questions about its intent.

There are other problems with this bill I will not address now. I will wait for the conference with the Senate.

I am pleased the gentleman is now moving this bill. Longshore amendments, as he knows, are long overdue. It is unfortunate the process broke down late last year and that our agreement could not have been resurrected this year. But I look forward to working with him in hope of concluding the conference as quickly as possible.

EXPLANATION OF HOUSE AMENDMENT TO S. 38

I. COVERAGE

The House amendment concurs with the Senate bill to a substantial degree, in clarifying coverage under the Act. The legislation recognizes that there are employees now covered by the Act whose responsibilities bear only an attenuated relationship to maritime employment. Accordingly, the exemption is intended to apply to fairly identifiable employers and employees who, although by circumstance happened to work on or adjacent to navigable waters, lack a sufficient nexus to maritime navigation and commerce. These specifically identifiable activities do not merit coverage under the Act, and the employees are more aptly covered under appropriate State compensation laws.

These excluded employees of employers include:

(1) Employees exclusively performing office clerical, secretarial, security, or data processing work;

(2) club, camp, restaurant, museum, retail outlet and marina personnel;

(3) personnel of suppliers, transporters or vendors temporarily doing business with covered employers;

(4) aquaculture workers;

(5) persons engaged in the construction or repair of recreational vessels under 65 feet in length;

(6) a master or member of the crew of any vessel wherever situated; and

(7) any person engaged by the master of a vessel to load, unload, or repair a vessel of displacement less than eighteen tons net.

It is the intention that these amendments not be interpreted to enlarge the present scope of the act's coverage. Nor is it the committee's intention to include classes of employers not already subject to the act. Finally, with the committee making only limited changes to section 2(3) and section 3 of the act, it is obvious that a large body of decisional law relative to traditional maritime employers and harbor workers remains undisturbed. The decision not to evaluate, endorse, or reject, explicitly or implicitly, the lower court and agency decisions in these other areas was made deliberately by the committee in conjuction with the limited changes that are being made.

With regard to the exemption for clubs, in particular, the House amendment adopts a non-restrictive interpretation. The exemption would apply so long as the club embodies a social, athletic, or sporting purpose, such as a yacht club. It is immaterial that the club may or may not be operated on a commercial or non-profit basis. An exemption based on the nature of the employing enterprise would produce inconsistent results for different employers similarly situated. For example, employees of a yacht club operated for-profit would be covered by the Act, although employees of a recreational marina (also operated for-profit) performing many of the same duties would be exempt.

Another provision in both the Senate bill and the House amendment is a statutory offset of Longshore benefits for any other workers' compensation or Jones Act benefits also received. The scope of the offset is to be broadly construed. The workers' compensation offset would, therefore, apply not only to instances where the employee received State workers' compensation, but where he received benefits under the Federal Employees' Compensation Act. Moreover, the offset is intended to apply where the employee's non-Longshore claim is against an employer other than the one against whom he has filed a Longshore claim. Accordingly, the court's decision on this point in Melson v. United Brands Corporation, 594 F.2d 1068 (5th Cir, 1979) is overruled.

The offset applies, as well, to cases paid by the special fund for any purpose for which the fund is authorized to make payment under the Act, and to any other fees and related expenses where the same claimant's representative assists the employee in pursuing both claims.

II. MEDICAL

The House amendment makes numerous changes relative to delivery of medical services, including requiring publication of a listing of medical providers not qualified to render care or services under the Act. The Secretary's authority to disqualify providers should be broadly construed in order to afford the means necessary to rid the program of unscrupulous medical providers. Accordingly, a medical provider's debarment under any other Federal or State program shall be per se grounds for debarment under this Act. Furthermore, in order to afford the Secretary the necessary flexibility in pursuing the means to control medical costs, the amendment contemplates the Secretary's use of fee schedules.

III. FRAUD

In addition to the debarment of medical providers, the House amendment includes other provisions designed to afford the Secretary the means for controlling fraud. Claimant representatives, whether or not they be attorneys, can be barred from representing claimants under the Act. The Secretary's authority, again should be broadly construed to encompass any fee-receipt context, whether the claimant's representative actually or constructively received a fee. Therefore, the Secretary's authority would extend not only to the obvious case where a claimant paid a fee directly to a representative, but also where it was paid to a third party which employed the representative, whether the third party be the employee's bargaining agent or an insurance carrier with which the bargaining agent had contracted for reimbursement of its member's legal expenses. Similarly, "fee" includes not only the obvious payment of an identifiable charge for services rendered in a given case, but encompasses an employee's union dues where the union provides its employees with representation as a service on a cost-free or subsidized basis. It would also cover a union's payments under contract to a third party to provide such services, where it cannot be shown that members' dues did not support such payments. Thus, not only would a union's retention of outside counsel fall within this definition, but so too would a union's payment of premiums to an insurance carrier for legal assistance insurance.

The amendment would authorize the Secretary to debar these individuals for conviction of any crime in connection with the representation of a claimant under this or any other workers' compensation statute; any crime so committed goes to the heart of a representative's ethical duty to ably represent his client, and there is no question that these practices should be dealth with severely.

In the same vein the Secretary is authorized to debar representatives for engaging in any fraud in connection with prosecution of a claim under this or another workers' compensation statute, and for being barred under another workers' compensation statute for professional misconduct similar to grounds for disqualification under section 31(b)(2), such as for soliciting employment in violation of section 28(e).

IV. HEARING LOSS CLAIMS

The House amendment makes several changes relative to compensation of hearing loss claims.

First, it would permit an employer to apportion liability between or among previous employers for the employee's pre-existing hearing loss. Deductions for pre-existing hearing loss are not novel, but the rule in 32 States. There is merit in permitting apportionment because the amendment increases the employer's retention period for special fund cases from two years to six years which, given the maximum allowable under the impairment schedule for hearing loss, would prevent an employer in the future from apportioning his liability through the special fund.

In order to apportion liability, however, the employer must abide by the rules governing administration of audiograms set forth in section 8(c)(13)(C). To be accorded presumptive validity, the audiogram must be administered by licensed or certified personnel, given to the employee when administered, with no contrary audiogram administered at that time by such licensed or certified personnel.

Although the amendment does not mandate administration of audiograms, their being at the employer's option, the employee cannot refuse an audiogram once the employer decides to exercise his option. The amendment's grant of discretional authority to an employer, coupled with the ability to mandate employee compliance with the object of that authority, is consistent with the amendment's grant to the employer of discretionary authority to require a disabled employee to submit a statement of outside earnings. It is also analagous to current law requiring an employee to submit to a medical examination, at the discretion of the Secretary.

The House amendment also requires that determinations of hearing loss be in accordance with the standard promulgated by the AMA's American Academy of Otolaryngology (AAO), known more accurately as the Guide for the Evaluation of Hearing Handicap, as it is modified from time to time. This provision will assure that hearing loss evaluations will be predicated on a uniform standard under the Act. Currently, the fact finder can employ any formula, resulting in disparate evaluations among compensation districts.

V. OCCUPATIONAL DISEASE CLAIMS

The House amendment clarifies section 13 of the Act, pertaining to time limitations on filing a claim for an occupational disease, employing a two-part test for triggering the one-year period. The period does not begin to run until the (A) employee's disease (i) has impaired the employee's functional capacity, or (ii) has resulted in a dimunition of wages, and (B) the employee or claimant becomes aware, or in the exercise of reasonable diligence or by reason of medical advice should have been aware, of the relationship between the employment, the disease, and the death of disability.

For the period to begin running, therefore, the employee must have a disease; merely physical conditions evidencing exposure to a disease-causing agent, while they may presage exposure to a disease-causing agent, while they may presage future disease, are not a "disease" for the purpose of this section.

"By reason of medical advice" is added as an independent trigger to accord a more subjective test of when a claimant may become aware of the relationship between his disease and the employment. It is not intended to supersede the alternative objective test which by exercising reasonable diligence he should have been aware of the relationship. Although the provision is intended to toll the statute of limitations until an employee becomes aware of the "full character, extent, and impact of the harm done to him" (Todd Shipyards Corp. v. Allan, 666 F.2d 399 (9th Cir, 1982)), the provision is not intended to imply that only a physician's medical advice would constitute such notice. Should the facts suggest the employee had, or should have had through his diligence, such knowledge absent a physician's actual diagnosis, the period would not be tolled.

The House amendment also amends section 10 (adding new subsection (e)) governing the "time of injury" for benefit determination purposes, stating that such time in occupational disease cases is deemed to be the date of the onset of the disabling condition. That date, logically, should correspond to the date for filing a claim—when the claimant becomes aware, or in the exercise of reasonable diligence or by reason of medical advice should have been aware, of the relationship between the employment, the disease, and the death or disability. A necessary corollary to establishing a date of injury for the purposes of filing a claim (thereby triggering the running of the statute of limitations on filing) is the date for measuring compensation payable. There is no compensable injury until there is a disability. When the disability arises, a claimant gains rights under the statute, including the right to compensation. Therefore, the right to the level of compensation based on the employee's wage level when the right accrues, applies.

Although new section 10(e) also provides rules for payment of compensation to employees not fully employed immediately prior to loss of functional capacity or loss of wages, the language is not intended to expand the employee's underlying eligibility for benefits, and, therefore, should not be read as broadening the eligibility for compensation of employees who manifest a disease after retiring.

VI. EMPLOYEE WAGE STATEMENTS

The House amendment affords employers a means of improved case monitoring by permitting them to require employees receiving compensation to submit a statement of earnings not more frequently than twice annually. An employee who fails to report earnings when requested, or omits or understates such earnings which he was required to so report; and the employer shall be given a full credit for any compensation paid during the period of noncompliance.

It is anticipated that employers will utilize the procedures for modification of awards set forth in section 22 for any subsequent adjustment to benefits.

VII. SETTLEMENTS

The amendment provides a means to expedite settlements by permitting automatic approval of any settlement agreement within 30 days after submitted to the deputy commissioner or administrative law judge for approval, where the parties are represented by counsel. Further, grounds for rejection of any settlement agreement must be stated.

The House amendment, as does the Senate bill, intends that a settlement forever discharge the liability of the employer, carrier or both; and a petition for modification of award under section 22 on any ground is inconsistent with this intent.

VIII. PRESUMPTION

The House amendment, while deleting the Senate amendment to section 20, endorsing the Supreme Court's decision in U.S. Industries/Federal Sheet Metal, Inc. v. Director, OWCP, 455 U.S. 608 (1982), similarly endorses that decision. Accordingly, the mere existence of a physical impairment is insufficient to establish a claim under the Act.

EXTENDING THE FEDERAL LONGSHOREMEN'S AND HARBOR WORKERS' COMPENSATION ACT TO COVER WORKERS IN THE FABRICATION OF MARINE PLATFORMS: AN ECONOMIC ANALYSIS

(By John R. Moroney, Professor and Head, Department of Economics, Texas A&M University, College Station, Tex., January 27, 1984)

EXECUTIVE SUMMARY

1. Extending the Longshoremen's and Harbor Workers' Compensation Act (LHWCA) to cover workers in the fabrication of marine platforms, following two 1983 U.S. Court of Appeals, Fifth Circuit decisions, raises unit labor costs in the U.S. construction industry. Estimated increases are approximately 4.8 percent in Texas, 9.0 percent in Louisiana, and 8.3 percent in Mississippi.

2. Such increases in unit labor costs make U.S. firms less competitive internationally.

3. Since 1979, Japanese and Korean firms have become the preeminent producers of major platforms located off of the U.S. West Coast. Nine of the last ten major West Coast platforms have been built abroad. These nine platforms embodied more than 4,000,000 manhours of direct construction labor (that is, more than 2,000 man-years of employment), and more than 90,000 metric tons of foreign steel.

4. Since 1981, Japanese and Korean firms have also established a strong foothold in the construction of platforms placed in the Arabian Gulf and offshore of India.

5. Thus far, all platforms in the U.S. Gulf of Mexico have been built in Louisiana, Texas, and Mississippi. Although foreign firms have not yet penetrated this potentially profitable market, some currently possess the technology to do so. Higher unit labor costs for U.S. producers increase the likelihood of effective foreign competition.

6. Analysis of unit labor costs in the United States, Japanese, and Korean steel manufacturing industries for the period 1973–1983 shows that Japanese and Korean unit labor costs are substantially below those in the United States: in 1981, for example, Japanese unit labor costs were about 42 percent, and Korean unit labor costs about 15 percent, of those in the United States. Such persistently lower costs have been a factor contributing to Japanese and Korean penetration of the U.S. market for steel products.

7. To maintain the court extended coverage of workers in the fabrication of marine platforms under the LHWCA will sustain U.S. unit labor costs at levels higher than necessary, and will make U.S. firms less competitive than they otherwise would be. If, because of higher U.S. costs, foreign firms were to capture a significant share of the U.S. Gulf of Mexico market, losses of several thousand U.S. jobs could ensue.

I. INTRODUCTION

The Federal Longshoremen's and Harbor Workers' Compensation Act is currently being revised. In the U.S. Senate, revisions have been completed according to S. 38; and a modified version of S. 38 has been reported out of the House Committee on Education and Labor. Two 1983 U.S. Court of Appeals, Fifth Circuit decisions extended, by court interpretation, the Longshoremen's and Harbor Workers' Compensation Act to include workers engaged in the onshore fabrication of marine platforms and workers employed on marine platforms located on Submerged Lands in state waters. Prior to these 1983 decisions both groups of workers were covered by state, not federal, workers' compensation laws.

This extension of the Longshoremen's and Harbor Workers' Compensation Act to onshore workers causes platform fabrication costs to increase. These increased costs will be of primary impact in Louisiana, but will be registered as well in Texas, Mississippi, California, and other coastal fabrication areas: 16 of the major U.S. marine fabrications facilities are located in Louisiana, three are in Texas, three are in Mississippi, and one is in California.

Until the present time, all platforms installed in the U.S. Gulf of Mexico have been built in Louisiana, Texas, or Mississippi. Industry officials are seriously concerned, however, that the higher domestic construction costs may permit penetration of Gulf Coast construction by lower-cost fabricators in Japan, Korea, and elsewhere. Major penetration, indeed dominance by foreign firms, has already taken place in the U.S. West Coast market: nine of the last ten major platforms installed in U.S. West Coast waters have been built abroad, causing a loss of more than 2,000 man-years of employment in the United States.

Since 1981, Japanese and Korean firms have competed aggressively and have been awarded an important share of offshore platform contracts in the Arabian Gulf and offshore India (as shown in Section IV of this report). If foreign fabricators were to make major inroads within the U.S. Gulf of Mexico, serious losses of domestic jobs in the onshore marine platform fabrication industry, material suppliers such as domestic steel, and in supporting industries could ensue.

The purpose of this report is threefold. The first is to demonstrate numerically the (percentage) increase in construction unit labor costs occurring because of the extension of federal coverage. This is the task of Section II. Second, we analyze recent trends in hourly worker compensation, labor productivity, and unit labor costs in United States, Japanese, and Korean steel manufacturing. We do so for two reasons: (i) the data necessary to conduct such an analysis in the onshore marine platform construction industry are not available from public sources; and (ii) domestic and foreign workers in steel manufacturing possess many of the same occupational skills as their counterparts in platform construction. Analysis of the steel industry is the focal point of Section III. Thirdly, we present some broad, summary data showing market penetration by Far East Asian fabricators in the U.S. West Coast, the Arabian Gulf, and offshore India.

The analysis of steel manufacturing is used as a source of analogy with platform construction. The analogy applies according as: (1) the spread between domestic and foreign average total costs in platform construction approximates the corresponding spread in steel; (2) domestic and foreign differentials in unit labor costs in platform construction approximate those in steel; (3) the percentage of average total cost ascribable to unit labor costs in platform construction approximates the corresponding percentage in steel; (4) the importance of transportation costs for fabricated offshore platforms items approximates that for steel mill products. The analysis of labor costs and industry performance in steel is used as a model for analyzing platform construction.

Key terms in this report

1. Output refers to physical production. In the case of steel, output means metric tons (M.T.) produced, as in Table 1, or M.T. of fabricated steel products, as in Tables 3 and 4.

2. Hourly Employee Costs are a comprehensive measure of hourly employment costs to the business firm, including average hourly wage rates plus overtime premiums, payroll taxes, supplementary unemployment benefits, pensions, insurance, workers' compensation insurance, paid vacations and holidays, and employer contributions to thrift plans. These costs are thus far more comprehensive than average hourly wages alone. In steel manufacturing, for example, in 1982 the ratio of additional compensation per hour to average hourly earnings was estimated to be 0.70 in the United States, 0.20 in Japan, and between 0.15 and 0.20 in Korea. (Source: U.S. Bureau of Labor Statistics, Office of Productivity and Technology, "Hourly Compensation Costs for Production Workers, Iron and Steel Manufacturing, 1975–1982." April, 1983).

3. Output per Manhour refers to physical output per hour of labor employed. In steel manufacturing, it refers to metric tons of finished and semi-finished steel products per worker hour.

4. Unit Labor Cost is the total labor cost embodied in one unit of physical output. In steel manufacturing, for example, unit labor cost is hourly labor cost (item 2, above) divided by metric tons produced per manhour (item 3, above); dollars per manhour divided by metric tons per manhour yields an estimate of dollars per metric ton.

5. Actual Operating Rates in the steel industries refer to actual physical production in a year in relation to capacity production capabilities. Actual operating rates are to be distinguishing from Standard Operating Rates, which are optimal industry production rates (approximately 90 percent of capacity production capabilities). The distinction is important: output per manhour may be substantially lower, and unit labor costs substantially higher, at Actual Operating Rates than those at Standard Operating Rates. This has been true in recent years for the U.S. and Japan.

6. Metric Tons (Tables 1, 3, and 4) and Net Tons (Table 5). One metric ton equals 1.1023 net ton, or 1 net ton equals 0.9072 metric ton.

II. THE CONSEQUENCES OF HIGHER INSURANCE PREMIUMS IN PLATFORM CONSTRUCTION

A. A general model

Consider a firm that fabricates a project with the use of a fixed stock of plant and equipment (relatively fixed costs), and labor and raw materials (relatively variable costs). The central economic distinction between fixed and variable costs in that fixed costs (or overhead costs) do not vary with changes in output, but variable costs do. Thus fixed costs per unit of output decrease continuously as output expands. On the other hand, variable costs per unit may either increase, decrease, or remain relatively constant as output increases. The actual behavior of variable costs per unit is not important for the analysis in this section. A representative firm's average fixed cost (AFC), average variable cost (AVC), and average total cost (ATC) curves appear in Figure 1.

What is important for this analysis is that an increase in wage rates or in labor insurance rates paid by the firm shifts the average variable and average total cost curves upward at all possible rates of production. For example, if labor accounts for 0.80 of all variable costs, then a 10 percent increase in unit labor cost shifts the AVC curve vertically by 8 percent at all possible rates of production. (More generally, if labor accounts for 0.X of all variable costs, a Z percent increase in unit labor costs shifts the AVC curve vertically by (0.XZ) percent at every possible rate of production). In the instance of a 10 percent increase in unit labor cost, in Figure 1 AVC would shift upward to AVC. The upward shift in AVC would also cause a higher average total cost for each possible output: ATC would shift upward to ATC, where the vertical distance between ATC and ATC (at each possible output) is exactly the same as the vertical distance between AVC and AVC. The higher variable cost and total cost per unit of output would place this firm at a disadvantage relative to potentially lower-cost competitors.

B. The specific application

One may analyze straightforwardly the increase in unit labor costs following an extension of the Federal Longshoremen's and Harbor Workers' Compensation Act (LHWCA) to workers previously covered by State Workmen's Compensation plans. Five categories of workers are affected: iron workers, welders, pipefitters, drivers, and permanent yard workers. The State Workmen's Compensation insurance premiums per $100 of payroll for each category of worker in Louisiana, Texas, and Mississippi, are listed below.

The LHWCA premiums are multiples of the state premiums. These multiples are constant across the five job classifications within a state but vary from state to state. In 1983, the multipliers were 2.61 in Louisiana, 1.70 in Texas, and 3.16 in Mississippi. Thus the LHWCA premiums were 161 percent higher in Louisiana, 70 percent higher in Texas, and 216 percent higher in Mississippi than the corresponding State Workmen's Compensation premiums.

Also listed are the percentages of total payroll (or job content) for the sum of all five categories attributable to each separate category for a typical platform construction project. These job content percentages vary from one project to another, but are believed to be a reasonably representative average.

Job classification	Percent of content	Premium
		La.	Texas	Miss.
Ironworkers	16	$6.00	$7.52	$5.05
Welders	40	8.07	9.71	5.31
Pipefitters	40	4.00	5.24	2.35
Drivers	2	2.71	5.56	2.93
Permanent yard	2	4.29	3.18	4.17

Under the State Workmen's Compensation Plan, the direct cost to a Louisiana employer per $100 of iron workers' payroll is $106.00, while under federal coverage the direct cost per $100 of payroll is $115.66 [$100+(2.61×$6.00)=$115.66]. Similarly, the direct cost per $100 of welders' payroll is $108.07 under state insurance, but $121.06 under federal coverage [$100+(2.61×$8.07)=$121.06]. But in Texas, for example the direct cost per $100 of iron workers' payroll is $107.52 under state coverage, but $112.78 under federal coverage [$100+(1.70×$7.52)=$112.78]. The federal premiums are higher for all job classifications than the corresponding state premiums. In general, the degree to which unit labor costs increase (given that labor productivity remains constant) by shifting from state to federal insurance coverage may be calculated as a weighted average of the percentage increases in premiums for each job classification.

The relevant weights are the percentages of job content attributable to each job classification. Reading from the percentage column above, let W_A=.16, W_B=.40, W_C=.40, W_D= .02 and W_E=.02.

The percentage increases per $100 of direct payroll occasioned by shifting from state to federal insurance coverage within each job classification in each state are listed below:

PERCENTAGE INCREASE PER $100 OF PAYROLL BY JOB CLASSIFICATION AND STATE

	Louisiana	Texas	Mississippi
Ironworkers	9.11	4.89	10.39
Welders	12.02	6.20	10.89
Pipefitters	6.19	3.49	4.96
Drivers	4.24	3.69	6.15
Permanent yard	6.62	2.16	8.65

The overall percentage increases in unit labor costs (conditional on the job content weights and on given productivity) are:

Louisiana: (0.16)(9.11) + (0.40)(12.02) + (0.40)(6.19) + (0.02)(4.24) + (0.02)(6.62)=8.96 percent.

Texas: (0.16)(4.89) + (0.40)(6.20) + (0.40)(3.49) + (0.02)(3.69) + (0.02)(2.16)=4.78 percent.

Mississippi: (0.16)(10.39) + (0.40)(10.89) + (0.40)(4.96) + (0.02)(6.15)+(0.02)(8.65)=8.30 percent.

Hence, direct unit labor costs increase in each state as a consequence of shifting from state to federal insurance coverage. It should be stressed that these estimated increases are conservative. Because federal coverage opens the possibility of third-party tort recoveries, and extended litigation, that are not present under state workers' compensation, actual unit labor costs could increase considerably more than indicated above.

Average total costs of fabrication increase as well. The proportionate increase could be estimated by multiplying the percentage increase in unit labor costs by the fractional share of these (five categories of) labor costs in total fabrication costs. Quantitatively, this is all that can now be said concerning the direct effects on production costs in the onshore marine platform construction industry. A complete analysis would require comprehensive information on all categories of cots both for domestic and foreign firms.

The major foreign competitors, according to industry sources, are firms in Japan and South Korea. Thus we proceed to analyze hourly employment costs, labor productivity, and unit costs in U.S., Japanese, and Korean steel manufacturing during the past decade.

This analysis is relevant for at least two reasons. First, platform construction and steel manufacturing employ work forces having similar ranges of skills, which can be developed by similar types of on-the-job training. Second, many of the economic characteristics such as lower wages and labor costs that determine lower-cost steel production abroad may also be major determinants of comparative international costs in platform construction.

III. AN ANALYSIS OF LABOR COSTS IN UNITED STATES, JAPANESE, AND KOREAN STEEL

A. Gross production (millions of metric tons) of raw steel, 1973-1983

During the decade 1973-1983, the U.S. steel industry could be described as a mature, declining sector. Aggregate annual steel production cycled around a downward trend from 1973 until 1981, then dropped abruptly from 108.8 million metric tons (M.T.) in 1981 to 66.4 million M.T. in 1982 (Table 1). Estimates published in World Steel Dynamics (July, 1983) are that production in 1983 will have recovered moderately to 84.0 million M.T. from the badly depressed level of 1982 (Table 1).

The Japanese steel industry grew very rapidly during reconstruction of their economy after World War II. By 1973 aggregate Japanese steel production was almost equal to that in the United States. And cumulative Japanese production for the ten years 1973-1983 was 1,074.9 million M.T., an impressive figure equal to 95 percent of cumulative U.S. production of 1,128.9 million M.T. during the same period. As shown in Table 1, Japanese annual production has been remarkably stable since 1975.

The Korean steel industry is quite a different story: In 1973, Korean steel was a fledgling industry producing only 1.16 million M.T. (less then one percent of either U.S. or Japanese output). But growth since 1973 has been spectacular: By 1982, annual production was fully ten times as great as that in 1973 (Table 1). The past decade was characterized by unprecedented growth in steel making capacity; and each year's enhanced capacity has been almost fully utilized (see World Steel Dynamics, July, 1983 Table 13). As will be seen in subsection C, with experience the growth of Korean steel was accompanied by a three-fold increase in Korean labor productivity.

The entries in this column for the years 1973–82 closely approximate (0.9072 × net tons produced), as reported by the American Iron and Steel Institute, 1982 Annual Statistical Report, table 1B, page 8.

B. Employee costs per hour, 1973–1983

Hourly employee costs include average hourly wage rates plus average hourly supplements such as payroll taxes, unemployment insurance, pensions, social insurance and other insurance contributions, and thrift plans. As shown in Table 2, hourly employee costs in U.S. steel manufacturing were nearly twice as large as those in Japanese steel throughout the period 1973–1983. Hourly costs approximately tripled in both countries during the ten-year period; hence at the end of the period hourly costs in Japan remained approximately one-half the level of those in the United States.

Hourly labor costs in Korea are but a small fraction of those in the United States: the Korean labor rate of $0.46 per hour in 1973 amounted to only six percent of the U.S. hourly rate; and the estimated Korean rate of $2.41 in 1983 is only 10 percent of the U.S. hourly labor cost.

If labor productivity in steel fabricating industries were roughly equal across countries, the lower hourly employee costs in Japan, and particularly in Korea, would give producers in those countries substantially lower labor costs per unit of output. But a crucial point must also be considered. Lower levels of labor productivity abroad serve to offset the cost-reducing effect of lower wages and fringe benefits. By contrast, higher levels of labor productivity abroad would magnify the effects of lower foreign wages and benefits, and would thus further widen the gap between U.S. and foreign unit labor costs. Hence it is essential to consider intercountry differences in labor productivity.

The estimates in column (4) for the years 1980–82 are higher than the corresponding U.S. Bureau of Labor Statistics estimates. See "Hourly Compensation Costs for Production Workers, Iron and Steel Manufacturing, 1975–1982," U.S. Bureau of Labor Statistics, Office of Productivity and Technology, April 1983

Note.—Hourly employee costs in Japan and Korea, expressed in U.S. dollars, depend not only on actual wage rates and fringe benefits in the home currency, but also on changes in exchange rates between the dollar and the yen, and between the dollar and the won. Since 1978, for example, the dollar has appreciated from 484 won per dollar to approximately 780 won per dollar. Hourly employee costs expressed in U.S. dollars are the relevant measure for the analysis in this report.

C. Output (metric tons) per man-hour, 1973–1983

Reliable data are available from the U.S. Department of Labor (Bureau of Labor Statistics, Office of Productivity and Technology) and from the Paine Webber publication, World Steel Dynamics, covering manhours per ton of steel products manufactured in the United States and Japan. The inverse, tons of steel products per manhour, is a key measure of labor productivity.

Levels of labor productivity in Korean steel manufacturing are not readily available. Fortunately, estimates of total manhours of employment in the Korean iron and steel manufacturing industries are published for the year 1982 in the Iron and Steel Statistical Yearbook, issued by the Korean Iron and Steel Association. This yearbook is in Korean, and the relevant material was kindly translated by Mr. Key P. Yang of the Chinese and Korean Section, U.S. Library of Congress. Given the benchmark estimates of gross output (metric tons of steel products in 1982) and total employment, one can estimate Korean output per manhour.

Indexes of gross output per man-day in Korean iron and steel manufacturing are published by The National Bureau of Statistics, National Planning Board, Republic of Korea. If one assumes that the growth rate in output per manhour has been the same as that in output per man-day, output per manhour can be estimated for the years prior to 1982. The estimates for Korea, the U.S., and Japan appear in Table 3.

Sources: Productivity estimates for the United States and Japan are computed from man-hours per metric ton shipped, reported in World Steel Dynamics, July 1983, table 6. Estimates for the United States, 1973–80, correspond closely with an unpublished labor productivity series supplied to the author by the U.S. Department of Labor, Bureau of Labor Statistics, Office of Productivity and Technology, dated December 1981.

Productivity estimates for Korea are developed by combining benchmark estimates of output per man-hour in 1982 with indexes of output per man-day published by the National Bureau of Statistics, Economic Planning Board, Republic of Korea. For details, see text of the report.

The World Steel Dynamics data base indicates that Japanese labor productivity was somewhat less than U.S. productivity in 1973. Because U.S. productivity remained flat through 1982, while Japanese productivity improved, output per manhour in the two countries was essentially equal by the early 1980's. Labor productivity in Korea began from a very low base (aproximately one-fifth that in the U.S. and one-fourth that in Japan), but has approximately tripled during the past decade. Although a sizable absolute gap remains between Korean labor productivity and that in Japan and the U.S., the rapid productivity growth in Korea has substantially moderated the increase in Korean labor costs (as will be seen in subsection D).

One should note that World Steel Dynamics (July, 1983, Table 6) also lists manhour per metric ton series for the U.S. and Japan at standard operating rates, defined as approximately 90 percent of capacity. These series indicate that potential Japanese labor productivity (at standard operating rates) grew far more rapidly then U.S. labor productivity (at standard operating rates) from 1973 through 1983, and exceeded U.S. productivity by approximately 20 percent in 1980, 1981, and 1982. These series, at standard operating rates, accord more closely with trends in U.S. and Japanese labor productivity in unpublished reports of the U.S. Bureau of Labor Statistics (September, 1981, and December, 1981), covering the period 1972–1980. To analyze actual labor costs, however, it seems preferable to use labor productivities based on actual operating rates rather than those based on standard (or optimal) operating rates.

D. Unit labor costs (dollars per metric ton), 1973–1983

Labor cost per unit of output is estimated by dividing employee compensation per hour (dollars per hour in Table 2) by output per hour (M.T. per hour in Table 3). The quotient is labor cost per metric ton. The behavior of unit labor cost is governed entirely by changes in the two variables, hourly compensation and productivity: If the percentage growth in hourly compensation exceeds the percentage growth in labor productivity, unit labor cost rises; and if the proportionate growth in productivity outstrips the percentage growth in hourly compensation, unit labor cost declines. (More precisely, the percentage change in unit labor cost equals the percentage change in hourly compensation minus the percentage change in output per manhour.)

Unit labor costs appear in Table 4. In comparing the three countries, three points stand out. First, unit labor costs in Japan were substantially lower than those in the U.S. chiefly because of Japan's lower rates of labor compensation (from Table 2). Differences in labor productivity between the two countries during the last ten years have not been very large (as shown in Table 3).

Second, Korean unit labor costs were only a small fraction of U.S. unit labor costs, ranging between one-seventh (1/7) of U.S. costs in 1982 and one-third (1/3) of U.S. costs in 1978. The main reason is that Korean hourly labor rates were minuscule by comparison with U.S. rates: Hourly compensation in Korean steel was about one-twentieth (1/20) of that in U.S. steel in 1974 and 1975, and had risen to approximately one-tenth (1/10) of U.S. compensation in 1982 and 1983. Indeed, if hourly compensation had been equal in the two countries, unit labor costs would have been much lower in the United States than in Korea because American labor productivity has been so much higher.

Third, as shown in Table 4, between 1973 and 1983 unit labor costs in Korean steel actually decreased from 30 percent to 18 percent of U.S. unit labor costs. The primary reason is that although American labor productivity remained at higher levels than those in Korea, Korean productivity tripled during this period while U.S. productivity changed very little.

Thus the considerable labor cost advantages realized in Japanese steel manufacturing, and even more so in Korean steel, are clear. These comparatively lower labor costs have been a contributing factor to the high level of Japanese steel exports to the United States throughout the past ten years. And they have without a doubt contributed to the extremely rapid growth of Korean exports to the United States.

Labor costs and other factors affecting the international competitiveness of American steel are reviewed in several sources. See, for example, Federal Trade Commission, The United States Steel Industry and Its International Rivals: Trends and Factors Determining International Competitiveness (Washington, D.C.: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1977); Charles A. E. United States trade with Japan and Korea: Steel mill products

Table 5 presents U.S. imports of steel mill products from Japan and Korea, and U.S. exports of such products to these countries, 1972-1982. Throughout this period the United States sustained major deficits in steel mill products trade with both countries. The deficit with Japan was already established by 1972, rose to a peak in 1976, and remained at a persistently high level. Japan has maintained a dominant comparative advantage in the trade of finished steel products: In no year during this period were U.S. exports of such products to Japan as much as one percent of U.S. imports from Japan.

The U.S. trade deficit in such products with Korea grew steadily throughout the period, apart from a surge in 1974 and an ebb in 1975. This growing deficit followed both from Korea's great expansion in raw steel making and steel finishing capacity, and from its strikingly lower unit labor costs.

The cumulative U.S. trade deficit in steel mill products with both countries combined, 1972-1982, is obtained by adding the annual deficits shown in the last column of Table 5. This cumulative deficit is 78,976,161 net tons of steel mill products. In turn, this can be translated into man-years of employment. Throughout the period 1973-1982, each metric ton of steel products in the U.S. required on the average about ten manhours (as shown in Table 3); hence each net ton required roughly 9.1 manhours (one M.T. equals 0.9072 net ton). The cumulative deficit thus translates into approximately 718,680,000 manhours [9.1 manhours per net ton x 78,976,161 net tons]. If one assumes that one man-year equals 2,000 manhours, the 1972-1982 cumulative trade deficit in steel mill products with Japan and Korea translates into 359,340 man-years displaced from U.S. steel manufacturing.

IV. FAR EAST ASIAN COMPETITION IN PLATFORM CONSTRUCTION

Japanese and Korean firms have established a major market in the United States for steel mill products, in part because of their lower unit labor costs. Likewise, Japanese and Korean firms have more recently become the preeminent fabricators of platforms located off the U.S. West Coast, and have established a solid foothold in the market for platforms in the Arabian Gulf and offshore of India. In this concluding section we review the penetration by Far East Asian firms in these markets, and discuss the consequences of potential foreign competition in U.S. Gulf of Mexico.

A. Far East Asian competition in the Arabian Gulf and Offshore India

During the years 1981-1983, forty-nine (49) significant projects were awarded for offshore platforms in the Arabian Gulf, and twenty-eight (28) such projects were awarded for offshore India. Far East Asian firms have established a competitive position in both markets, as shown below by the estimated percentage of total fabrication manhours for all such projects that can be ascribed to Far East Asian firms:

Year	Percent of manhours ascribed to Far East Asian firms
	Arabian Gulf	Offshore India
1981	30	15
1983	29	33

Based on manhours required for construction, Asian firms have captured in the last three years 32 percent of the Arabian Gulf market and 26 percent of the market for offshore India. These firms have thus established successful penetration in these two areas.

B. Far East Asian competition in the U.S. west coast

The penetration by Far East Asian firms in the U.S. West Coast platform market is even more impressive. Listed below are the data of the ten (10) major contracts awarded since 1979, the customer (platform buyer), the platform name, and the country in which construction occurred or will occur.

Year	Customer	Platform name	Constructed in 1979	Chevron	Grace	Japan.
1980	Union Oil	Gina	Japan.
1980	Shell	Elly	Malaysia.[1]
1980	Shell	Ellen	Malaysia.[1]
1981	Union Oil	Gilda	Japan.
1981	Texaco	Habitat	Japan.
1982	Shell	Eureka	United States.
1983	Chevron	Edith	Japan.
1983	Chevron	Hermosa	Japan.
1983	Texaco	Harvest	Korea.

[1] Awarded to an overseas entity of a U.S. firm.

It is estimated that all ten projects combined will embody more than 5,500,000 manhours of labor. Of this total, the nine projects constructed abroad will account for more than 4,000,000 manhours, or approximately 2,000 man-years of work. It is also estimated that construction abroad will require more than 90,000 metric tons of foreign steel. If instead these platforms had been built domestically with domestic steel, approximately 450 man-years of additional employment would have been available in the U.S. steel industry. Asian firms are now the dominant producers of platforms to be located on the U.S. West Coast. This highly effective foreign competition has reduced both the direct demand for American labor in West Coast construction and the indirect demand for American workers in supporting industries.

C. Potential competition in the U.S. Gulf of Mexico

All platforms placed thus far in the U.S. Gulf of Mexico have been built in Louisiana, Mississippi, or Texas. Although foreign producers have not yet penetrated this large and potentially profitable market, Japanese and Korean firms possess the technology to do so.

The extension of the Longshoremen's and Harbor Workers' Compensation Act to cover onshore platform fabrication workers raises unit labor costs. The average increase is approximately 4.8 percent in Texas, 9.0 percent in Louisiana, and 8.3 percent in Mississippi. From the viewpoint of economic policy, it seems unwise to maintain this cost-inflating coverage. For to maintain it will burden Gulf Coast platform construction with an unnecessarily costly toll. Higher costs, by making domestic firms less competitive, could culminate in the loss of jobs and capital investment. If this should happen, the winners would be foreign workers and suppliers; the principal losers would be displaced American workers.

WATERFRONT CORRUPTION (S. REPT. NO. 98-369)

I. FINDINGS AND CONCLUSIONS

Six days of hearings in February of 1981 by the Senate Permament Subcommitttee on Investigations showed that corrupt practices were commonplace on the Atlantic and gulf coast waterfronts.

The hearings were conducted under authority granted the Governmental Affairs Committee and its duly authorized subcommittees by Rule XXV of the Standing Rules of the Senate and by Senate Resolution 361, which was agreed to on March 5, 1980.

Section 3 of Senate Resolution 361 authorized the Subcommittee to conduct investigations of labor racketeering and organized criminal activities and to identify the individuals involved.

Senator Sam Nunn of Georgia, who was Chairman of the Subcommittee in the 96th Congress, directed the staff inquiry in 1980. He then chaired the 1981 hearings, with the concurrence of the new Chairman, Senator William V. Roth, Jr., of Delaware.

Citing criminal activity within the International Longshoremen's Association and the American shipping industry, witnesses at the hearings described the struggle for economic survival in ports that are riddled with kickbacks and illegal payoffs to union officials.

Witnesses testified the payoffs were a part of virtually every aspect of the commercial life of a port. Payoffs insured the award of work contracts and continued contracts already awarded. Payoffs were made to insure labor peace and allow management to avoid future strikes. Payoffs were made to control a racket in workmen's compensation claims. Payoffs were made to expand business activity into new ports and to enable companies to circumvent ILA work requirements.

Organized crime was found to have great influence in the operation of the ILA and many shipping companies. Some shipping firms, because of fear or a willingness to participate in highly profitable schemes, have learned how to prosper in the corrupt waterfront environment. They treat payoffs as a cost of doing business.

The free enterprise system has been thrown off balance. Contracts were not awarded on the basis of merit. The low bid did not beat the competition. Profitability was not based on efficiency and hard work but rather on bribery, extortion and questionable connections. The combination of these corrupt practices was a recipe for inflationary costs and economic decline.

Much of the corruption on the waterfront stemmed from the control organized crime exercises over the ILA, a condition that has existed for at least 30 years.

In the mid-1950's, reports of widespread corruption in the ILA led to a Congressional investigation into labor racketeering on the docks. The Senate Select Committee on Investigation of Improper Activities in the Labor or Management Field, an extension of the Senate Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations, looked into the problem of ILA involvement in waterfront corruption.

In August of 1957, the Select Committee, chaired by Senator John McClellan of Arkansas, called as witnesses Captain William V. Bradley, president of the ILA, and Thomas (Teddy) Gleason, General Organizer and the union's third ranking official.

Pointing to the ILA's record of tolerating corrupt practices within its leadership ranks, Senator John F. Kennedy of Massachusetts pressed Bradley and Gleason on what constructive steps they were taking to control questionable and illegal conduct by union officials.

Senator Kennedy noted, for example, that according to the New York State Crime Commission, 30 percent of the officials of ILA longshore locals had police records.

Bradley and Gleason responded in general terms, saying, in effect, that they were not running a police department and that they didn't expect to move any more vigorously against ridding their union of corrupt officials.

Twenty-four years later in February of 1981, Gleason who had been president of the ILA since 1963, was still defending his union against charges that it was controlled by organized crime figures, I am here today to deny that, emphatically, categorically, and without any reservation whatsoever." [1]

Gleason went on to say that witnesses before the Subcommittee has asserted that the ILA was controlled by gangsters but that nowhere in the hearing record was there evidence to support such an allegaton. Gleason said:

"You have up to now drawn or permitted to be drawn an inference that the union and I are so dominated (by organized crime), there is no direct, unequivocal, or reliable evidence of any such dominance. Certainly none has been produced here".[2]

Gleason was wrong on both assertions. He failed to refute the charge that his union is controlled by organized crime. And he ignored the preponderance of evidence when he said none had been produced showing the substantial influence organized crime exercised on his union's activities.

A document handed to Gleason at the hearings, Subcommittee exhibit No. 2,[3] was a chart showing the names of senior ILA officials who had been convicted of felonies in the federal government's investigation of waterfront labor-management corruption.

Known by the acronym, UNIRAC, for union racketeering, the investigation and subsequent prosecutions resulted in convictions of more than 20 of the ILA's most prominent leaders.

Equally damaging to the ILA and Gleason's claims that the union is free of organized crime's dominance was evidence showing that several of the ILA leaders were members or associates of traditional La Cosa Nostra or Mafia families.

Confronted with the chart showing the ILA officiais' convictions, Gleason would not address adequately the fact that his union's leadership had so many felonious criminals in its ranks.

It could not have escaped Gleason's attention that Anthony Scotto, president of the ILA's largest local, No. 1814 in Brooklyn, was convicted of racketeering, demanding and accepting payoffs and federal income tax fraud.

It could not have escaped Gleason's attention that Scotto, as international Vice President and General Organizer, was a nationally prominent labor leader, a man with substantial political influence and the ILA leader mentioned frequently as likely to succeed Gleason as president.

Nor could it have escaped Gleason's attention that Scotto was identified in 1969 as being a member of the Carlo Gambino crime family and that as recently as 1979 court-authorized electronic surveillance and police observation established that Scotto was summoned to a Brooklyn bar by Michael Clemente, a crime family gangster of considerable notoriety, so that the two of them, Scotto and Clemente, could discuss the very government investigation that would eventually send them both to prison.

With Scotto, there were other ILA international vice presidents who were convicted of labor racketeering—George Barone and William Boyle of Miami, Anthony Anastasia of New York, Vincent Colucci of New Jersey and William Landon of Jacksonsville, Florida. Barone, Anastasia and Colucci have been identified by the Department of Justice as being members of organized crime families while Boyle has been identified as an associate.

Fred R. Field, Jr., the former General Organizer of the ILA; Carol Gardner, an international assistant general organizer, and Thomas Buzzanca, an international organizer, were convicted of labor racketeering. Buzzanca has been identified by the Justice Department as being a member of a crime family and Field was identified as an associate.

Barone, Bazzanca, Colucci and Landon were presidents of ILA locals. Anastasia was an executive vice president of an ILA local. Another convicted officer, James Vanderwyde, was coordinator for the Atlantic Coast District of the ILA and an officer in a Miami ILA local.

These were some of the better known ILA officials convicted of labor racketeering. There were others in smaller ports—seven in Wilmington, North Carolina; two in Charleston, South Carolina; and one each in Mobile, Alabama; San Juan, Puerto Rico; Houston, Texas; Boston, Massachusetts; Jacksonville, Florida; New Orleans, Louisiana; Tampa, Florida; Southport, North Carolina; and Port Allen, Louisiana.

An even more damaging development that came out of the government's inquiry was the fact that the senior members of the waterfront conspiracy—Scotto, Field, Barone, Buzzanca, Colucci, Gardner, Boyle, Vanderwyde—were found to be controlled by gangsters outside the union. To varying degrees, they were doing the bidding of organized crime figures whose conduct had been brought to the attention of law enforcement for many years.

Evidence showed that Colucci, Gardner and Buzzanca took direction from a Genovese crime family operative in New Jersey, Tino Fiumara. Barone, Boyle, and Vanderwyde were found to be under the direction of another Genovese family figure, Anthony Salerno.

Anthony Scotto, who the Justice Department said 12 years ago was a Gambino family member—and who, under oath before a state crime legislative panel, invoked the fifth amendment privilege against self-incrimination when asked about his ties to the Gambino family—also owed some allegiance to the Genovese gang. Scotto's acquiesence to Mike Clemente's summons was a display of the loyalties of a man who enjoyed the friendship and trust of important political leaders. Scotto had many connections in the respectable world, yet he still had to meet his obligations to the organized crime figures who got him his ILA job.

Scotto's loyalties to crime families constituted a betrayal of the labor movement and the many working men and women who trusted and believed in him. However, because he happened to have friends in important positions outside labor, his conduct is no more a betrayal of the valid principles of trade unionism than was the conduct of other ILA officials who broke the law.

Teddy Gleason's testimony before the Subcommittee was not in keeping with a labor leader whose first commitment is to his members and to the principles of trade unionism. The evidence is overwhelming that criminals have a strong voice in his union. He should have acknowledged that such a problem exists and he should have indicated what steps he is taking to correct it. The most obvious action he can take is to exercise the clause in the ILA constitution which enables the union to remove from office officials who are found to be unfit for their positions.

The Congress also has a responsibility. It should strengthen existing laws to allow government to do more to clean up corruption when it exists in unions such as the ILA. The Subcommittee believes there are four specific legislative proposals which Congress should enact. They are:

(1) Congress should amend Federal law as it relates to the rights of union officials to remain in office once they have been convicted of certain serious crimes. The law, 29 U.S.C. 504, prohibits any person from serving as a union official or employee for a period of five years if he has been convicted of robbery, bribery, extortion, embezzlement, grand larceny, burglary, arson, narcotics violations, murder, rape, assault with intent to kill, assault which inflicts grievous bodily injury, or a violation of the labor laws relating to reporting and disclosure by unions and union trustees.

As the law now stands, disbarment does not become effective until all appeals have run. From the testimony the Subcommittee has received in the waterfront hearings and other hearings, it is apparent that some union officials continue in office, even after indictment and conviction, and use their office to commit crimes involving their official union position until their appeals are exhausted. As Supreme Court Chief Justice Burger has noted in his public statements, the appellate procedures often have resulted in continuing delays and seemingly endless processes which continue for years and years. During the lengthy appeals process, many convicted labor leaders hold fiduciary positions and continue to abuse them.

Congress should amend the law so that those union officials, upon conviction, can be immediately suspended from office.

(2) The same statute, 29 U.S.C. 504, should be expanded to include more crimes which can form the basis for expelling a labor official from office. For instance, the statute does not cover a Taft-Hartley Act violation. The acceptance of a payoff by a union official from an employer is not a crime requiring disbarment by section 504. In addition, federal prosecutors are concerned that conviction of a person for running a criminal enterprise—a RICO violation, in the terminology of prosecutors—may not be grounds for dismissal from a union fiduciary position.

The Subcommittee believes that the statute should be amended to provide that any serious crime a union official commits in his official position should be sufficient cause to remove him from office.

(3) The statute under the Taft-Hartley Act having to do with payoffs should have a stronger penalty. The law, 29 U.S.C. 186, prohibits employers from paying off union officials. No matter what the size of the payoff—whether it is $100 or $100,000—the crime is always the same, a misdemeanor subject to relatively low fines and very short imprisonment.

The misdemeanor penalty may be all that some payoffs call for. But many payoffs are more serious instances of breaches of fiduciary trust and should be dealt with accordingly. Many payoffs are given with regularity and eventually add up to hundreds of thousands of dollars. In the payoffs demanded of certain shipping executives, the financial losses totalled millions of dollars. Moreover, a gang, systematically demanding payoffs from an entire section of an industry, can reap illicit returns in the millions of dollars if the racket goes on for years.

The cost of payoffs eventually must be passed on to the consumer. The cost of doing business may become so exorbitant that a firm will go out of business. Violators responsible for these kinds of economic hardships should be made to endure substantial imprisonment. Their lawlessness inflicts suffering on companies, employees and society at large.

The Congress should make it a felony to demand payoffs and to make payoffs as well. Punishment should be severe. The point should be made—in terms that waterfront gangsters in both labor and management can understand—that labor payoffs are not sanctioned by the Federal Government.

(4) Longshore and other waterfront workers should be protected fully against the cost of job-related injuries. However, there should be a mechanism installed in the compensation claims process to assure that the insurance system is not exploited illegally.

The Federal Longshoremen's and Harbor Workers' Act makes it too easy for longshoremen to feign or exaggerate injuries. The burden of proof is placed on the employer, who must demonstrate that the claimant's injury is non-existent or is not as serious as he and his doctor say it is.

As seen in the Subcommittee's hearings, one company with operations on the Brooklyn pier saw its annual workmen's compensation claims jump from $230,000 to $1.4 million in two years. The only way the company could bring down the claims was to begin paying off ILA Local President Anthony Scotto $5,000 a month. Costs then returned to a more reasonable level. The subcommittee received testimony indicating that another company suffered such high workmen's compensation claims that it went bankrupt because of them.

The onslaught of fraudulent claims resulted, inpart, from the abuse of those provisions of the Federal Longshoremen's and Harbor Workers' Act which allow the injured employee a "free" choice of treating physician. The Act should be amended to require that employees select treating physicians from a list of authorized physicians compiled by the Department of Labor from names submitted by employers. Workmen's compensation, as envisioned by Congress, is designed to insure employees against the possibility that they would be unable to work and earn a livelihood because of an injury at work. By striving to protect the legitimate concerns of the worker who is injured on the job, the Congress created an invitation for the unscrupulous to create yet another waterfront racket. By providing for a listing of authorized physicians, the rights of the workers will continue to be protected while the potential for fraud will be reduced.

In addition to its findings in the legislative area, the Subcommittee makes the following additional findings:

(1) With respect to the waterfront, the Subcommittee believes in the need for state, local and regional commissions and regulations to fend off the abuses documented in the hearings. The New York-New Jeresey Waterfront Commission has been in existence for nearly 30 years. It has not stopped corruption completely in the Port of New York. But is does exercise many valuable law enforcement and regulatory services. As one Federal prosecutor put it, the commission has not solved every problem, but things would be much worse without it.

The Subcommittee notes that hoodlums were expelled from the Port of New York by the commission in the 1960's. But, because there were no such regulatory government components in the gulf coast ports, these crime figures were able to go to Miami, Savannah, Norfolk and other Southern ports and resume their criminal conduct under the guise of trade unionism. The situation is intolerable. State legislatures and local governments should study the example of the New York-New Jersey Waterfront Commission and consider creating their own regulatory entity to oversee port activities.

(2) The Subcommittee's hearings, showing the need for local, state and regional regulatory bodies on the waterfront, also demonstrated the value and necessity of vigorous, imaginative law enforcement by state and local police. Nowhere was the effectiveness of state investigative work better displayed than in the two-and-one-half year undercover operation run by the New Jersey State Police in the Newark area.

Known as Project Alpha, the investigation consisted of state police officers, in an undercover capacity, operating a trucking company that gradually fell under mob control. Assisted by the FBI and funded in part by a $1 million grant from the Law Enforcement Assistance Administration, Project Alpha demonstrated the many illegal pursuits of the Geneovese and Bruno crime families in the Newark area.

As a result of the inquiry, state and federal charges were brought against 34 persons for a variety of crimes including possession of stolen property, unlawful sale of handguns, conspiracy for possession of stolen property, possession of counterfeit New Jersey Certificates of Titles, possession of counterfeit checks, loansharking, possession of counterfeit New Jersey Drivers licenses and interstate transportation of stolen property.

Important as the criminal prosecutions stemming from Project Alpha were, also valuable was the new information law enforcement officials were able to learn about the internal workings of the crime families, how mob members work with one another in certain circumstances and how they compete in others.

The Subcommittee commends the New Jersey State Police for its outstanding work in Project Alpha. Praise is also in order for federal authorities for supporting this worthwhile effort. The Subcommittee believes this to be the kind of Federal-State cooperative project which benefits society and provides taxpayers with the best return on their money.

The Subcommittee encourages Federal law enforcement agencies to use Project Alpha as a demonstration of what positive results can be achieved when Washington lends its resources and support to legitimate State and local investigations.

(3) Although some employers were victims of economic extortion and fear of organized crime, other firms became willing participants, eager to pay off to gain a competitive edge in the marketplace. The Subcommittee believes that the trade associations which represent these employers should establish strict ethical standards of conduct for their members. The business executives on the waterfront who pay off should be prosecuted. Those who don't pay off should be protected by their trade associations and by State and Federal laws.

(4) Information developed in the waterfront corruption hearings, coupled with information that came out of the Subcommittee's examination of the government's investigation of the Teamsters Central States Pension Fund, demonstrated that the U.S. Department of Labor has not taken an effective role in combating corruption in national unions.

The corruption, which was shown to be pervasive in the ILA, acts to the detriment of honest union members and officials and can only cause disarray, decline and inflation in the industries it afflicts. The Labor Department has primary jurisdiction in this area but has not met its obligations. It has neither created an adequate presence in the field; nor has it shown a willingness to build cases against corrupt union officials.

An example of the Labor Department's erroneous attitude was seen in the waterfront corruption hearings. A workmen's compensation claims racket had sprung up in the early 1970's on the Brooklyn docks. According to testimony received at the hearings, the Labor Department was aware that there was a problem but did nothing to stop it. On the other hand, the department continued to insist upon the strictest interpretation of the law which put the entire burden of proof on the employer to demonstrate that a longshoremen's claim was fabricated or exaggerated. The Labor Department should have taken steps to require more proof of genuine injury. That was the proper solution to the problem. When the Labor Department refused to take corrective action, one of the employers faced with increasingly costly compensation claims solved the problem in his own way. He began paying off a labor leader $5,000 a month. His claims returned to a more reasonable level.

It is the responsibility of the Labor Department to protect union leaders and honest officials. The department has personnel on the scene where labor racketeering first surfaces. They have access to information that no other federal agency has. No other federal component is vested with the authority and the tools to detect, investigate and dispose of properly information indicating corrupt and questionable practices in the labor-management field.

As the Subcommittee noted in its report on the Teamsters Central States Pension Fund inquiry,[4] the Labor Department should be more assertive in detecting and investigating instances of labor-management racketeering. Without comprehensive and vigorous Labor Department investigative support, the government will continue to be handicapped in its attempts to assure honest and fair trade unionism.

It should be pointed out that since the issuance of that report, there have been indications of a more vigorous policy of strong ERISA enforcement at the Labor Department. In May 1983, Secretary Donovan announced a $6.5 million settlement of the outstanding suits against the current Trustees of the Teamsters Central States Pension and Health and Welfare Funds. The Department also successfully negotiated the imposition of judicially enforced consent decrees to monitor future asset management by the Fund, as previously recommended by the Subcommittee.

The Subcommittee is also encouraged by the efforts of the Organized Crime and Racketeering Section of the Inspector General's Office of the Labor Department. During hearings this year on both the Hotel Employees & Restaurant Employees International Union and Organized Crime in the Mid-Altantic Region, the Subcommittee received testimony of the fine work of that office in investigating and referring for prosecuting major organized crime and labor racketeering cases. The Labor Department should continue these efforts, on the waterfront and elsewhere, to vigorously enforce federal labor laws.

In addition, Justice Department prosecutors, working in harmony with Organized Crime Strike Forces and the FBI, should continue to pay close attention to what is happening on the nation's docks. The UNIRAC inquiry was successful, one of the few instances in the history of law enforcement in which an entire industry became the target of a carefully managed and well executed investigation.

But UNIRAC, for all its successes, did not rid waterfronts of all crimes or all criminals. Corrupt practices, according to some witnesses before the Subcommittee, already have begun to return to the Altantic and gulf coast docks. What is needed, then, is continued scrutiny of the maritime industry by government agencies.

In this era of reduced Federal spending, cutbacks are occurring in all fields, including law enforcement. All functions of government can and must be made more efficient and economies must be achieved whenever possible. It is the Subcommittee's view, however, that the shipping industry is too vital to the nation's economy to be allowed to be policed inadequately because of fiscal belt tightening. It would be shortsighted budget cutting, for example, to reduce the federal presence on the waterfront to save money while, at the same time, mutli-million dollar dockside rackets are allowed to reemerge, resulting in higher costs to consumers on imported goods and artificially higher costs on American products shipped abroad.

H. RECOMMENDATIONS

(1) The Senate Permanent Subcommittee on Investigation recommends that Congress pass the Labor-Management Racketeering Act, S. 336. That legislation was passed twice by the Senate during the 97th Congress but was not acted upon in the House, In the 98th Congress, the bill was passed by the Senate of June 20, 1983 and again referred to the House for consideration. Based on information developed in the Subcommittee's waterfront corruption hearings, the bill addresses principal findings put forward in this report.

One of the most important points made in the waterfront hearings was the fact that payoffs from businesses to labor leaders and from shipping executives to other shipping executives take place with great frequency on the docks. These payoffs, though illegal under current federal law, are punishable only as misdemeanors.

S. 336 makes any violations involving $1,000 or more a felony, punishable by up to five years in prison or a fine of up to $15,000 or both.

The bill also attempts to rid labor unions and employee benefit plans of the influence of persons who have been convicted of crimes. Current disbarment provision (29 U.S.C. 504 and 29 U.S.C. 1111) are expanded in several significant ways by: (1) enlarging the criminal offenses resulting in disbarment; (2) enlarging the categories of persons affected by the disbarment provision; (3) increasing the duration of time the convicted person is barred from office from five years to a possible maximum of ten years; and (4) providing for disbarment immediately upon conviction, rather then after appeal.

The measure provides that any salary otherwise payable will be placed in escrow pending final disposition of any appeal.

The legislation clearly delineates the responsibility of the Department of Labor to seek actively and effectively to detect, investigate and properly refer to prosecutors instances of waterfront crime.

(2) The Subcommittee recommends that both management and labor take steps to insure against the types of corruption and fraud which these hearings documented. Labor unions such as the ILA cannot remain indifferent to the corrupt influences of organized crime on the waterfront. They must shoulder the responsibility of "cleaning their own house." As a start, they should act to guarantee that union affairs no longer remain in the hands of individuals convicted of fraud and other corrupt practices. The unions themselves must be firm in encouraging strict standards of integrity on the waterfront among their own members.

Moreover, there must be an equally strong commitment against corruption by management interests. Trade associations and other groups representing management should enact strong and binding codes of ethical conduct for their industry. A unified stance against fraud and corruption must be recognized by their memberships. The National Association of Stevedores (NAS) has in fact enacted an ethical code as a direct result of the evidence produced during these hearings as well as the express hearing-closing recommendations of Senators Nunn and Rudman. The Federal Trade Commission, in fact, has approved that code is being in full compliance with the pertinent provisions of anti-trust laws. The Department of Justice and the FTC should encourage the enactment of similar codes by other management groups representing the waterfront industries.

(3) The Subcommittee recommends that Congress pass the Longshoremen's and Harbor Workers' Compensation Act Amendments (S. 38). This legislation was passed by the Senate in July of 1982 and again in June of 1983.

In the face of the corruption and fraud brought to light in these hearings, S. 38 attempts a comprehensive revision of the system of workman's compensation now in effect along America's waterfronts. Testimony before the Investigations Subcommittee established the members and associates of organized crime have manipulated the current provisions of the Federal Longshoremen's and Harbor Workers' Act so as to profit considerably by a growing and widespread fraudulent claims racket. S. 38 in addition to numerous other needed revisions in the Act, deals with the problem of criminal fraud and abuse in the present workmen's compensation system. Included are measures which were expressly recommended during the course of these hearings: (1) revision of physician selection, reporting, and reexamination requirements designed to insure payment for valid claims only, (2) increases showing required to qualify for Section 20, which automatically grants a presumption of validity to any claim filed under the Act; and (3) increasing the criminal penalty for misrepresentation under the Act from a misdemeanor to a felony. The enactment of each of those provisions would vastly improve current procedures for uncovering fraudulent claims filed under the act.

Mr. MILLER of California. Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time.

Mr. ERLENBORN. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Texas (Mr. BARTLETT).

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I rise to support S. 38.

While this is not a perfect set of solutions to the problems of the Longshore Act, and there are provisions in this bill with which I have reservations, this legislation makes much needed modifications, particularly in the special fund and in the insurability areas.

Now, the Longshore Act itself over this past decade, particularly since the 1972 amendments, has done some things which we did not want it to do. It has made American shipping uncompetitive with the rest of the world. It has made insurance risks highly speculative, drastically increased insurance rates, made insurance difficult to acquire and therefore has discouraged shippers from using American ports. It has encouraged abuse of the special fund; so while not ideal and while much more work remains for the conference, S. 38 moves constructively toward addressing these problems.

The core of S. 38 is in its fostering of insurability. The 1972 amendments broadened jurisdiction and fully indexed death benefits and instated unrelated death benefits.

There has also been an erosion of the exclusivity of Longshore Act benefits, thus increasing employer costs as they defend longshore and State workmen's compensation and Jones Act claims. S. 38 deals with the insurability crisis.

□ 1320

The bill would: First, cap the annual escalator at 5 percent; second, would repeal unrelated death benefits; and third, would cap the death benefits at 200 percent of the national average weekly wage.

These changes should put significant downward pressure on insurance rates and increase insurance availability.

A second important provision is the bill's reform of the special fund. The fund disbursements have burgeoned from $3,035,000 in fiscal year 1976 to an estimated $23,622,000 in fiscal year 1982.

The original purpose of the fund, to remove employers' disincentives to hiring and retraining handicapped employees by spreading the costs of the subsequent injuries across the industry, was a good purpose. Unfortunately, the fund has evolved into a general risk-spreading mechanism that employers have been unwittingly driven to use in efforts to escape the high cost of the act.

This bill increases the employer's retention period from 2 to 6 years. There are also other provisions that take pressure off the fund for uses for which it was not designed.

I look forward to further progress in reforming the Longshore Act in conference and the fund in conference, and I hope significant changes in the amendment formula can be made.

S. 38 is a good start to reform, but it is only a start. I urge my colleagues to support this constructive beginning at reforming the Longshore Act and also to resolve to continue to work toward further improvement of the act.

I yield back to the gentleman from Illinois.

● Mrs. BOGGS. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of passage of S. 38 which amends the Longshore Act. I would like to express my appreciation to the subcommittee chairman (Mr. MILLER) and the ranking Republican on the subcommittee (Mr. ERLENBORN) and their respective staffs for their efforts in bringing this bill before the House. This has been a lengthy and, at times, tedious undertaking, but I think the effort has been worthwhile.

In particular, I would like to express my appreciation for the subcommittee's willingness to listen to my concerns about the impact of the Longshore Act on industry and employment in my district, which includes one of the world's leading ports with its associated stevedoring operations, shipbuilding and ship repair yards, barge fleeting activities, offshore service operations, grain elevators, and so forth.

I believe we must have a systematic approach to fairly, reasonably and swiftly provide benefits for workers in these industries who are injured in the course and scope of their employment and who are not otherwise covered by State worker compensation laws. The Longshore Act serves an essential purpose, but as a result of nearly five decades of judicial interpretation and congressional amendments, the scope of the act has become overly broad and confused. Chief Justice Berger has characterized the act as being "about as unclear as any statute could conceivably be."

The 1972 amendments to the act have given rise to many of these problems and there is widespread dissatisfaction with the unrealistic and costly benefit structure. Over the years the tax-free benefits provided have dramatically increased to the point where they often exceed before injury take home pay. Thus, workers are discouraged from returning to work.

Likewise the act encourages the filing of less than substantive claims. The result has been a significant increase in claims and costs. The cost increases engendered by the 1972 amendments were many times greater than those estimated when the amendments were enacted. Cases have been cited at congressional hearings of employer insurance costs running as high as $30 to $40 per $100 of payroll and there have been some examples of costs in excess of $80 per $100 of payroll.

Faced with such escalating costs, insurers have become reluctant to assume Longshore Act risks and, where insurance is available, it is prohibitively costly. As a result, many employers have been forced to become self-insured. I cannot believe this is the way Congress intended for the act to operate because "self-insurance" is, in reality, no insurance at all.

Another concern about the act has been the lack of clear jurisdictional boundaries which has resulted from imprecise legislative language and the resulting litigation. Then, there is the problem of the special fund which, though financed by employers and insurance carriers, is administered by the Labor Department. Many are of the opinion that the interest of the fund are not adequately protected in this administration. Finally, the cumbersome procedures, compounded with general administrative problems, have exacerbated the problems encountered by those who deal with the act.

In sum, the 1972 amendments have made the act uninsurable, unaffordable and not susceptible to proper administration. Both Houses are now on the verge of addressing these concerns in a meaningful and comprehensive manner. I am very pleased to see us reach this point. I would like to discuss several of my special concerns.

Late in the last session I learned of recent Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals decisions which extended coverage of the act beyond the original intent of Congress and the intent as expressed in the 1972 amendments. In these cases—Thornton against Brown and Root, Inc., and Herb's Welding against Gray—the Longshore Act was extended respectively to include onshore fabrication of offshore platforms and work performed on offshore platforms located on the submerged lands in State waters. Since offshore platforms were first used in the early 1950's, their onshore fabrication and use in State waters has always been subject to State, not Federal, workers' compensation laws.

Currently, there are between 12,000 and 13,000 American workers engaged in the fabrication of offshore platforms and rigs. This is down from the 1978 peak year when there were between 18,000 and 19,000 Americans so engaged. This reduction in employment has resulted, in part, because of the economic slump and the slowdown in energy exploration and development, and, in part, as a result of increased competition from Japanese, Korean and other foreign platform fabricators. The additional costs resulting from the Longshore Act could increase costs to the point that domestic fabrication is no longer competitive with foreign manufacturing and this will lead to the loss of a substantial number of jobs, both in Louisiana and elsewhere.

I appreciate the efforts of the chairman and staff to try to deal with this particular issue. Since I have only recently seen the language that has been proposed to resolve it, I would hope that this particular issue and the proposed solution would undergo a further review and reevaluation when the conferees meet to resolve differences between the two versions of the bill.

Two other provisions concern me. The first is the matter of indemnification agreements between offshore drilling contractors and subcontractors working on the Outer Continental Shelf. The Senate version of the bill permits indemnification agreements on the OCS while the House is silent. I would hope this matter will be addressed.

And second, the Senate version reinforces the exclusivity of remedy provision in the current law. The committee amendment offered this afternoon removes this provision. I am afraid this action will be counterproductive and should receive thorough study by the conferees.

This legislation is the result of a bipartisan effort to address some of the serious problems affecting the Longshore Act. There is substantive support for this legislation from both industry and labor. If enacted, I believe this reform will make the Longshore Act affordable and insurable while remaining one of the most liberal worker compensation systems in the country. I urge passage of the bill.

Thank you.●

● Mr. FORD of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of S. 38, a bill to amend the Longshoremen's and Harbor Workers' Compensation Act. Everyone who is familiar with the longshore compensation program will agree that this legislation will effect a significant improvement in the program.

The bill makes a series of meaningful changes in the act which will help to reduce the costs of the compensation program and will clarify which employees are covered by the act. Some of the more significant amendments include specificity with respect to which employees are covered, and under what conditions coverage applies; capping of annual COLA's at 5 percent; elimination of unrelated death benefits.

These amendments, along with the other changes proposed by the bill, will refine and improve the longshore compensation program. Insurers will be able to make more accurate projections to set rates and reserves for future payment, thus making their risks more "insurable." Employer will benefit from reduced costs of insurance. Employees will know whether or not they are covered by the Longshore Act, and will benefit from other remedial changes in the bill.

Mr. Speaker, this legislation is the product of negotiations conducted over a long period of time. It represents the views and interests of employers, employees, insurers, and the Government agency that administers the program. The legislation has been a long time in the formation, and its enactment is long overdue. I urge my colleagues to join me in voting in the affirmative.●

Mr. ERLENBORN. I have no further requests for time, and I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. MILLER of California. Mr. Speaker, I have further requests for time, and I yield back the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from California (Mr. MILLER) that the House suspend the rules and pass the Senate bill, S. 38, as amended.

The question was taken.

Mr. BATEMAN. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that a quorum is not present and make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to clause 5, rule I, and the Chair's prior announcement, further proceedings on this motion will be postponed.

The point of no quorum is considered withdrawn.

STATE MINERAL INSTITUTES PROGRAM

Mr. McNULTY. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H.R. 4214) to establish a State mining and mineral resources research institute program, and for other purposes, as amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

H.R. 4214

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

AUTHORIZATION OF STATE ALLOTMENTS TO INSTITUTES

SECTION 1. (a) There are authorized to be appropriated to the Secretary of the Interior (hereafter in this Act referred to as the "Secretary") funds adequate to provide for each participating State $300,000 for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1985, and

$400,000 for each fiscal year thereafter for a total of five years, to assist the States in carrying on the work of a competent and qualified mining and mineral resources research institute or center (hereafter in this Act referred to as the "institute") at one public college or university in the State which meets the eligibility criteria established in section 10: Provided, That—

(1) such funds when appropriated shall be made available for grants to be matched on a basis of no less than one and one-half non-Federal dollars for each Federal dollar during the fiscal years ending September 30, 1985, and September 30, 1986, and no less than two non-Federal dollars for each Federal dollar during the fiscal years ending September 30, 1987, September 30, 1988, and September 30, 1989;

(2) if there is more than one such eligible college or university in a State, funds appropriated under this Act shall, in the absence of a designation to the contrary by act of the legislature of the State, be granted to one such college or university designated by the Governor of the State; and

(3) where a State does not have a public college or university eligible under section 10, the Committee on Mining and Mineral Resources Research established in section 9 (hereafter in this Act referred to as the "Committee") may allocate the State's allotment to one private college or university which it determines to be eligible under such section.

(b) It shall be the duty of each institute to plan and conduct, or arrange for a component or components of the college or university with which it is affiliated to conduct, competent research, investigations, demonstrations, and experiments of either a basic or practical nature, or both, in relation to mining and mineral resources, and to provide for the training of mineral engineers and scientists through such research, investigations, demonstrations, and experiments. The subjects of such research, investigations, demonstrations, experiments, and training may include exploration, extraction, processing, development, production of mineral resources, mining and mineral technology, supply and demand for minerals, conservation and best use of available supplies of minerals, the economic, legal, social, engineering, recreational, biological, geographic, ecological, and other aspects of mining, mineral resources, and mineral reclamation; having due regard to the interrelationship with the natural environment, to the varying conditions and needs of the respective States, and to mining and mineral resources research projects being conducted by agencies of the Federal and State governments, and by other institutes.

RESEARCH FUNDS TO INSTITUTES

SEC. 2. (a) There is authorized to be appropriated to the Secretary $7,500,000 for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1985, said amount to be increased by $1,000,000 for each fiscal year thereafter for four additional years, which shall remain available until expended. Such funds when appropriated shall be made available to institutes to meet the necessary expenses for purposes of—

(1) specific mineral research and demonstration projects of broad application, which could not otherwise be undertaken, including the expenses of planning and coordinating regional mining and mineral resources research projects by two or more institutes, and

(2) research into any aspects of mining and mineral resources problems related to the mission of the Department of the Interior, which are deemed by the Committee to be desirable and are not otherwise being studied.

(b) Each application for funds under subsection (a) of this section shall, among other things, state the nature of the project to be undertaken, the period during which it will be pursued, the qualifications of the personnel who will direct and conduct it, the estimated costs, the importance of the project to the Nation, region, or State concerned and its relation to other known research projects theretofore pursued or being pursued, the extent to which the proposed project will provide opportunity for the training of mining and mineral engineers and scientists, and the extent of participation by nongovernmental sources in the project.

(c) The Committee shall review all such funding applications and recommend to the Secretary the use of the institutes insofar as practicable to perform such special research, and shall recommend institutes for the performance of such special research on the basis of qualifications without regard to race or sex of the personnel who will conduct and direct it, and on the basis of the facilities available in relation to the particular needs of the research project, special geographic, geologic, or climatic conditions within the immediate vicinity of the institute in relation to any special requirements of the research project, and the extent to which such project will provide opportunity for training individuals as mineral engineers and scientists. The Committee shall recommend to the Secretary the designation and utilization of such portions of the funds authorized to be appropriated by this section as it deems appropriate for the purpose of providing scholarships, graduate fellowships, and postdoctoral fellowships.

(d) No funds shall be made available under subsection (a) of this section except for a project approved by the Secretary and all funds shall be made available upon the basis of merit of the project, the need for the knowledge which it is expected to produce when completed, and the opportunity it provides for the training of individuals as mineral engineers and scientists.

(e) No funds made available under this section shall be applied to the acquisition by purchase or lease of any land or interests therein, or the rental, purchase, construction, preservation, or repair of any building.

FUNDING CRITERIA

SEC. 3. (a) Funds available to institutes under sections 1 and 2 of this Act shall be paid at such times and in such amounts during each fiscal year as determined by the Secretary, and upon vouchers approved by him. Each institute shall—

(1) set forth its plan to provide for the training of individuals as mineral engineers and scientists under a curriculum appropriate to the field of mineral resources and mineral engineering and related fields;

(2) set forth policies and procedures which assure that Federal funds made available under this Act for any fiscal year will supplement and, to the extent practicable, increase the level of funds that would, in the absence of such Federal funds, be made available for purposes of this Act, and in no case supplant such funds; and

(3) have an officer appointed by its governing authority who shall receive and account for all funds paid under the provisions of this Act and shall make an annual report to the Secretary on or before the first day of September of each year, on work accomplished and the status of projects underway, together with a detailed statement of the amounts received under any provisions of this Act during the preceding fiscal year, and of its disbursements on schedules prescribed by the Secretary.

If any of the funds received by the authorized receiving officer of any institute under the provisions of this Act shall by any action or contingency be found by the Secretary to have been improperly diminished, lost, or misapplied, such funds shall be replaced by the State concerned and until so replaced no subsequent appropriation shall be allotted or paid to any institute of such State.

(b) The institutes are authorized and encouraged to plan and conduct programs under this Act in cooperation with each other and with such other agencies and individuals as may contribute to the solution of the mining and mineral resources problems involved, and moneys appropriated pursuant to this Act shall be available for paying the necessary expenses of planning, coordinating, and conducting such cooperative research.

DUTIES OF THE SECRETARY

SEC. 4. (a) The Secretary shall administer this Act and, after full consultation with other interested Federal agencies, shall prescribe such rules and regulations as may be necessary to carry out its provisions. The Secretary shall furnish such advice and assistance as will best promote the purposes of this Act, shall participate in coordinating research initiated under this Act by the institutes, shall indicate to them such lines of inquiry as to him seem most important, and shall encourage and assist in the establishment and maintenance of cooperation by and between the institutes and between them and other research organizations, the United States Department of the Interior, and other Federal establishments.

(b) On or before the first day of July in each year beginning after the date of enactment of this Act, the Secretary shall ascertain whether the requirements of section 3(a) have been met as to each institute and State.

(c) The Secretary shall make an annual report to the Congress of the receipts, expenditures, and work of the institutes in all States under the provisions of this Act. The Secretary's report shall indicate whether any portion of an appropriation available for allotment to any State has been withheld and, if so, the reason therefor.

AUTONOMY

SEC. 5. Nothing in this Act shall be construed to impair or modify the legal relationship existing between any of the colleges or universities under whose direction an institute is established and the government of the State in which it is located, and nothing in this Act shall in any way be construed to authorize Federal control or direction of education at any college or university.

MISCELLANEOUS PROVISIONS

SEC. 6. (a) The Secretary shall obtain the continuing advice and cooperation of all agencies of the Federal Government concerned with mining and mineral resources, of State and local governments, and of private institutions and individuals to assure that the programs authorized by this Act will supplement and not be redundant with respect to established mining and minerals research programs, to stimulate research in otherwise neglected areas, and to contribute to a comprehensive nationwide program of mining and minerals research, having due regard for the protection and conservation of the environment. The Secretary shall make generally available information and reports on projects completed, in progress, or planned under the provisions of this Act, in addition to any direct publication of information by the institutes themselves.

(b) Nothing in this Act is intended to give or shall be construed as giving the Secretary any authority over mining and mineral resources research conducted by any agency of the Federal Government, or as repealing or diminishing existing authorities or responsibilities of any agency of the Federal Government to plan and conduct, contract for, or assist in research in its area of responsibility and concern with regard to mining and mineral resources.

(c) No research, demonstration, or experiment shall be carried out under this Act by an institute financed by grants under this Act, unless all uses, products, processes, patents, and other developments resulting therefrom, with such exception or limitation, if any, as the Secretary may find necessary in the public interest, be available promptly to the general public. Patentable inventions shall be governed by the provisions of Public Law 96-517. Nothing contained in this section shall deprive the owner of any background patent relating to any such activities of any rights which that owner may have under that patent.

(d) There are authorized to be appropriated such sums as are necessary for the printing and publishing of the results of activities carried out by institutes under this Act and for administrative planning and direction, but such appropriations shall not exceed $1,000,000 in any single fiscal year.

CENTER FOR CATALOGING

SEC. 7. The Secretary shall establish a center for cataloging current and projected scientific research in all fields of mining and mineral resources. Each Federal agency doing mining and mineral resources research shall cooperate by providing the cataloging center with information on work underway or scheduled by it. The cataloging center shall classify and maintain for public use a catalog of mining and mineral resources research and investigation projects in progress or scheduled by all Federal agencies and by such non-Federal agencies of government, colleges, universities, private institutions, firms, and individuals as may make such information available.

(1) continuing review of the adequacy of the Government-wide program in mining and mineral resources research;

(2) identification and elimination of duplication and overlap between agency programs;

(3) identification of technical needs in various mining and mineral resources research categories;

(4) recommendations with respect to allocation of technical effort among Federal agencies;

(5) review of technical manpower needs, and findings concerning management policies to improve the quality of the Government-wide research effort; and

(6) actions to facilitate interagency communication at management levels.

In making these six appointments the Secretary shall consult with interested groups.

(b) The Committee shall consult with, and make recommendations to, the Secretary on all matters relating to mining and mineral resources research and such determinations as are required to be made under this Act. The Secretary shall consult with, and consider recommendations of, such Committee in such matters.

(c) Committee members, other than officers or employees of Federal, State, or local governments, shall be, for each day (including traveltime) during which they are performing Committee business, paid at a rate fixed by the Secretary but not in excess of the daily equivalent of the maximum rate of pay for grade GS-18 of the General Schedule under section 5332 of title 5 of the United States Code.

(d) The Committee shall be jointly chaired by the Assistant Secretary of the Interior responsible for minerals and mining research and a person to be elected by the Committee from among the members referred to in paragraphs (5), (6), and (7) of subsection (a) of this section.

(e) The Committee shall develop a national plan for research and development in mining and mineral resources, considering ongoing efforts in the universities, the Federal Government, and the private sector, and shall formulate and recommend a program to implement the plan utilizing sources provided for under this Act. The Committee shall submit such plan to the Secretary, the President, and the Congress on or before March 1, 1986, and shall update the plan annually thereafter.

ELIGIBILITY CRITERIA

SEC. 10. The Committee shall determine the eligibility of a college or university to participate as a mining and mineral resources institute under this Act using criteria which include—

(1) the presence of a substantial program of graduate instruction and research in mining or mineral extraction or closely related fields which has a demonstrated history of achievement;

(2) evidence of institutional commitment for the purposes of this Act;

(3) evidence that such institution has or can obtain signficant industrial cooperation in activities within the scope of this Act; and

(4) the presence of an engineering program in mining or minerals extraction that is accredited by the Accreditation Board for Engineering and Technology, or evidence of equivalent institutional capability as determined by the Committee.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is a second demanded?

Mr. LUJAN. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, a second will be considered as ordered.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Arizona (Mr. MCNULTY) will be recognized for 20 minutes and the gentleman from New Mexico (Mr. LUJAN) will be recognized for 20 minutes.

The Chair now recognizes the gentleman from Arizona (Mr. MCNULTY).

Mr. MCNULTY. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

The concept of a mineral institute goes back to the late 1960's when it became apparent that the United States was becoming increasingly dependent on foreign supplies of essential minerals.

It also recognized that the industry had failed to advance domestic mineral technology at a fast enough rate.

So in the 92d Congress the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs held hearings on legislation to create mineral institutes. The legislation had the dual aims of funding research and educating tomorrow's mining professionals.

Unfortunately, there was an uphill battle trying to enact that legislation but it was finally attached to the surface mining bill as title III of that package.

After years of toiling and several Presidential vetoes, the program was underway when the Surface Mining Control and Reclamation Act was signed into law in 1977.

Now the original authorization is about to expire and we have before us a bill to extend the program for another 5 years.

Perhaps the most important point which needs to be made about this bill is that it looks to the future. It is not an immediate solution to our country's dependence on foreign supplies, nor even an answer for specific problems of extraction, reclamation, and processing of minerals.

The bill, though, is aimed at the education of the specialists that we need to face tomorrow's shortages, and it is the students we are educating today who will carry the burden of finding whatever metals and minerals resources there are to keep us from being totally dependent upon foreign supplies.

Already in its short life the mineral institutes program can point to a number of important achievements. A study conducted at the University of Arizona Institute has made great strides in measuring the effects of air and ground vibrations which result from detonations. These findings have significance in that they allow those who would set off these blasts to measure and predict the effect of the vibrations and thus engage in a program of protecting both structures and people.

In addition to extending the program for 5 years, the committee amendment makes important improvements in the original title III. The Advisory Committee on Mining and Minerals Resources Research has been expanded to include representatives from the academic, industrial, labor, and conservation communities.

Moreover, the advisory committee is given the authority to determine eligibility of individual institutes for continued funding under criteria set out in the bill.

Finally, it ought to be recognized that the bill before us authorizes less money than the original act and requires a higher ratio of non-Federal matching funds. That is a signal to the States and to the industry that both will have to assume a greater responsibility for the continued vitality of the program.

In summary, Mr. Speaker, the bill looks to the future and attempts to insure that we will have the technology and the trained personnel we need to make the most of our mineral resources. It makes administrative improvements in the program, reduces the level of funding, and I strongly urge the House to pass this bill.

I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. LUJAN. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself as much time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of H.R. 4214, a bill which authorizes for 5 more years funding of State mining and mineral research institutes.

We all know that the current economic condition of the mineral industry is at a low level. This is certainly no time to jerk the rug out from under a program that over the past 5 years has been very successful.

The mineral institute programs provide allotment funds to initiate new research projects; and they provide scholarships and fellowships to a large number of faculty, researchers, undergraduate and graduate students.

The students coming out of our universities actually have a better education in mineral-oriented areas. They are now in a much better position to provide needed know-how for industry, research centers, and government organizations.

My colleagues might appreciate the seriousness of the situation facing the U.S. mineral-oriented research community by looking at the following facts.

As recently as 15 to 20 years ago, only about 15 percent of all patents awarded in the United States were to foreign nations.

The current figures I am told are much higher.

As a consequence, we are purchasing more foreign know-how from small countries like Sweden, Finland, Switzerland, as well as from Germany and Japan.

If this trend is not reversed, the United States might become an underdeveloped country in the area of technology of mineral exploitation.

I congratulate Mr. McNULTY and the other sponsors of this legislation, who have structured H.R. 4214 to broaden the support of the program by State agencies and the private sector, while cutting back on the amount of Federal dollars needed.

With present Federal budget restraints being what they are, such an approach is essential. I like the provision in the bill that requires available grants to be matched on the basis of no less than $1½ non-Federal for each Federal dollar, for the first 2 years; and then no less than $2 non-Federal for each Federal dollar for each succeeding year.

We are heading in the right direction with this legislation, and I welcome this proposed change in the program, as well as some of the other proposed changes, providing for greater flexibility.

The program has begun to perform the basic research so vital to our mining industry, and it is starting to train the personnel so badly needed in the new technologies being developed.

I know that it is time for an evaluation of where the institute program has taken us thus far, and that it is time to establish some new priorities and goals.

That is exactly what this legislation does. I urge my colleagues to vote for its passage.

Mr. LUJAN. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Missouri (Mr. EMERSON).

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Speaker, I rise in strong support of this bill and at the outset and, as an original cosponsor of the bill, want to commend the gentleman from Arizona (Mr. McNULTY) and the gentleman from New Mexico (Mr. LUJAN) for their outstanding leadership in pursuing this matter. I am delighted to see this bill before the House today. It is terribly important to the State of Missouri and to the University of Missouri at Rolla, which I have the honor to represent.

Mining and mineral processing and fabrication are important industries in Missouri. The State ranked seventh nationally in the value of nonfuel minerals in 1982, as reported by the U.S. Bureau of Mines. Annual mineral production value, including mineral fuels, has been around $1 billion since 1978. The preliminary estimate for 1982 is $922 million, about equally divided between metals and industrial minerals. Nationally, the State ranked first in output of lead and fire clay; second in barite, zinc and crude iron oxide pigments; third in lime, fourth in cement, and fifth in copper, crushed stone, and silver. The lead-zinc mines in the Viburnum Trend produced over 92 percent of the lead and 20 percent of the zinc mined in the United States in 1982. Iron ore pellets and specialty iron oxide products were produced by the Pea Ridge Iron Ore Co.

The Pea Ridge mine is the only underground iron mine still operating in the United States. Cement and lime plants strategically located along the Mississippi River, were dominant factors in the industrial minerals sector. Production of coal and crude oil were at moderate levels during 1982 despite the recession.

Mining and mineral resources education and university research in Missouri is centered in the school of mines and metallurgy of the University of Missouri-Rolla where it has resided since 1870. Mineral engineering departments include ceramic engineering, geological engineering, metallurgical engineering, mining engineering, nuclear engineering, and petroleum engineering. Geology and geophysics is also housed within the school.

The Missouri State Mining and Mineral Resources Research Institute is administered by the school of mines and metallurgy and faculty from all of the academic departments participate in institute activities.

Since the inception of the State mine institute program in Missouri, a variety of activities of benefit to the State, region, and Nation have been accomplished. Since 1978 when the program started, approximately 130 undergraduates, and 100 masters and Ph.D. mineral engineering students have been supported through scholarships, fellowships or research stipends. A number of the undergraduates have chosen to pursue advanced degrees which, in turn has helped increase the seriously depleted base of mineral engineers with advanced degrees.

Research projects initiated by faculty of the school of mines and metallurgy and conducted jointly with graduate students have had as their objective, the solution of problems of concern to the State of Missouri and surrounding areas. Some 33 research projects supported wholly or in part by State mine institute funds have been conducted since 1978. Topics of research have been quite varied but of significance to the region. The following examples of topics illustrate the nature of State mine institute research being conducted in the school:

Remote sensing for mined land reclamation and control—Northwest Missouri;

Minimizing losses of values to flotation milltailings—lead belt;

Dust scrubber design for continuous miner—underground coal mining;

Blasting research—general mining;

Evaluation of the use of a computerized data base for lead mineralization exploration—lead belt;

Sulfation and removal of zinc from electric steelmaking furnace flue dusts—toxic wastes;

An analysis of grinding mill noise—lead belt;

Prediction of subsidence associated with underground coal mining—regional mining; and

Geochemistry and isotope ratios of the cobalt and nickel minerals of the Mississippi Valley-type deposits in Fredericktown, Missouri—mineral exploration;

On September 1, 1982, the Bureau of Mines of the U.S. Department of the Interior awarded a grant to the University of Missouri-Rolla for the creation of a generic mineral technology center for pyrometallurgy. Additional funding was received in 1983 and a new funding is expected in 1984. The grant is part of the research phase of the State mine institute program. The generic center for pyrometallurgy has initiated research projects designed to develop and analyze concepts and principles of significance to the field of pyrometallurgy. Major program thrusts involve projects dealing with smelting and refining of metals roasting of metallurgical ores, and plasma metallurgical processing. These projects all relate to activities of direct concern to the mineral industries of Missouri and are expected to support the development of high tech procedures and industries.

The various projects underway and planned encompass matters such as utilizing metal ores of decreasing quality, concentration of metallurgical feedstock, higher quality metal products, and lowered emissions of toxic substances in the workplace and in the environment. The generic center for pyrometallurgy is also establishing a library of technical literature with the goal of providing technology transfer services for government agencies, universities and industry.

Mr. Speaker, it should be obvious how important this legislation is to Missouri and our Nation's mining industry. I urge my colleagues to support this bill.

Mr. LUJAN. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Idaho (Mr. CRAIG).

Mr. CRAIG. I thank my colleague for yielding to me.

Mr. Speaker, I join in support of H.R. 4214, congratulate my colleague from Arizona (Mr. MCNULTY) for his fine leadership in this effort. I do not believe there is any question in the minerals industry today that continued research and ongoing studies is a critical and necessary tool in the furtherance of that industry and the furtherance of the basic economy of this country.

I recall so very well when we were debating wilderness bills recently before the House Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs that new findings that 6 months ago had not been true in the industry but were true at that moment of the debate, was changing the attitude considerably of the members of the committee and of the support of a given piece of legislation simply because new knowledge was available.

If we are to believe that all knowledge now exists in this area, if we are to believe that further research and the direction of students in the area of research in the minerals field cannot benefit us short term and long term, then I think we are very shortsighted at best.

Not only is this a benefit to the University of Idaho and the School of Mines there, but to a good many other institutes across the country and most assuredly it offers to this Nation the kind of informational and educational base that will serve us so well in the years ahead as we continue to strive to maintain a degree of independence as a nation when it comes to being able to effectively utilize and to research for new areas of mineral exploration.

Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time, and I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. MCNULTY. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Arizona (Mr. UDALL).

Mr. UDALL. Mr. Speaker, I rise in strong support of the legislation.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to begin by commending my good friend and Arizona colleague, JIM MCNULTY, for his hard work on this bill. It is because of this leadership that the House has before it the Interior Committee's amendment to H.R. 4214, the mineral institute bill.

Mr. Speaker, this bill is of particular interest to me. When Congress enacted the Mineral Institute Program as part of the Surface Mining Control and Reclamation Act of 1977 I knew we had put in place a program with the potential for generating knowledge which would be worth far more than its modest cost in Federal dollars. In the first 6 years the institutes have proved this axtom.

In a report to Congress the institutes list a number of achievements which more than justify our continued support.

One area in which they have been active is in helping to develop environmentally sound mining techniques. For example, the North Dakota Institute has a program designed to evaluate surface and ground water problems associated with strip mine sites. This research has enabled scientists to predict mining impacts on ground water and has become an important tool in the design of mining operations.

The institutes have also been active in supporting students with scholarships and fellowships. In the 6 years since the passage of SMCRA the number of trained professionals receiving advanced degrees in mining and minerals disciplines has increased dramatically. In 1978 only 11 doctorates were awarded in seven mining disciplines. By 1982, however, the number had almost tripled to 31. The rise in the number of masters degrees has been even more impressive.

The important point is that these are the trained professionals of a new generation who will be charged with finding and extracting our scarce mineral resources. These scientists and engineers will carry the burden of keeping our mining industry competitive and reducing our dependence on foreign sources.

Mr. Speaker, the committee substitute for H.R. 4214 is a balanced approach to the continuation of this program. It is a 5-year extension of the program which authorizes less Federal funding and requires more support from State and industry sources than the original authorization. This approach preserves the Federal role in the program while at the same time sending a message to others that their continued sponsorship is required.

The administration of the program is also improved by the McNulty bill. Academic, industry, labor, and conservation representatives are directed to serve on the Secretary's Advisory Committee. This should result in better coordination among all the interests involved.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, the McNulty bill is a reallistic approach to the continuation of an important program, I am proud to have been a sponsor of the program when it was first created, and I am even more proud to have seen it grow into the success it is today. Mr. Speaker, I urge the House to pass the bill.

● Mr. MCCAIN. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of this measure which would extend the State Mining and Mineral Resources Research Institute Program.

I believe this bill recognizes two fundamental points. First, the importance of keeping our country in the forefront of developments in the international mining industry. Secondly, the need for continued Federal involvement in these kinds of programs.

The necessity for a strong mining industry should be obvious to all of us. The products of this industry, energy, minerals, and metals, are crucial to our economy and to the maintenance of our standard of living. Today our mining industry faces many serious problems. The grade of our ores is declining while labor, transportation and environmental costs are increasing. To stay competitive in the international field, we must continually increase our productivity and find innovative methods of production. The key to this is our people.

We need the best educated and trained individuals in the world. I believe this bill will help accomplish that goal. By providing financial assistance to several of our institutes of higher learning, we facilitate the ongoing development of programs which will produce the research and instruction vital to a modern education in the mining industry.

In addition, this bill recognizes that States and industry cannot do this alone. They need Federal assistance. In a matter of such critical importance to our Nation, the Federal Government should be involved. But just as importantly, this legislation continues to recognize that this area is not the sole responsibility of the Federal Government. While the current law provides for Federal funding to be matched dollar for dollar with non-Federal dollars, this bill specifies that in fiscal 1985 and 1986, each Federal dollar be matched by $1½ non-Federal. For fiscal 1987 and beyond, each Federal dollar will be matched by $2 non-Federal.

I believe this bill will make a significant contribution to our Nation's mining industry. I urge all of my colleagues to support it.●

● Mrs. VUCANOVICH. Mr. Speaker, I rise in strong support of H.R. 4214, a bill to reauthorize the State Mining and Mineral Institute program.

The program provides significant benefits to both the industry and to the Nation. The institutes train individuals in a wide range of disciplines relating to mining and these individuals, after completing their education, find jobs with the mining industry, and share their training and knowledge. The institutes also make research available which is of great value to the industry for maximizing the recovery of minerals that are needed for our Nation's domestic supply and for our national security.

H.R. 4214 would authorize $7.5 million in fiscal year 1985, to be increased by $1 million per year through 1989. The bill requires the matching of Federal funds from State and private sources on a 1½ to 1 and then on a 2-to-1 basis. In this way, Federal dollars are used to encourage State and private investment in minerals research. Given the importance of our efforts as a nation to achieve independence from unstable foreign sources of minerals and energy, I am firmly convinced that the Federal Government has a responsibility to promote research and development of new mining technologies. I strongly support H.R. 4214 and urge my colleagues to join me in voting to suspend the rules and pass this very important piece of legislation.●

● Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I am an original cosponsor of this legislation introduced by Congressman JIM MCNULTY, to reauthorize and improve the State Mining and Mineral Resources Research Institute Program. I want to commend my friend and colleague from Arizona for his outstanding work on bringing this important legislation to the floor.

Mr. Speaker, the State Mining and Mineral Institutes across the country have proven to be very effective in training people for careers in mineral and mining industries and in improving our mineral research capabilities. However, we must continue to improve our mining techniques in order to remain competitive in the world marketplace. According to the State Mineral Resources Research Institute at New Mexico Tech, our lack of improved technology in the mining field has become a serious problem. The United States is being forced to purchase an ever-increasing amount of mining technology from other nations. We must put a stop to this dangerous trend.

This legislation makes a number of improvements in the Mining and Mineral Institute Program by requiring an increased financial support from the community and industry and by assuring coordination between educational facilities, industry, and Government.

Mr. Speaker, I am confident this legislation will revitalize the Mining and Mineral Institute Program and make certain that our mining industry is supplied with the best technology and the most talented employees possible.

I urge Members to vote for H.R. 4214.●

● Mr. DASCHLE. Mr. Speaker, I rise today in strong support of H.R. 4214, a bill reauthorizing the State Mineral Institutes Program. There is little question that this program has been an outstanding example of the type of Federal, State, and private sector cooperation that should serve as a model for other Government programs. The thrust of this program is to use a very limited amount of Federal funding as seed money for expanded, basic research in mining techniques and general mineral exploration.

The value of such basic research, especially at a time when we are all becoming increasingly aware of the necessity to make maximum possible use of our mineral resources, cannot be underestimated. For all the talk, both pro and con, about an expanded role for the Federal Government in what has come to be known as industrial policy, the program before us for reauthorization today seems to me to represent a totally noncontroversial example of what the ideal working relationship between the public and private sectors should be. This program seeks, for a very minimum Federal investment, to provide the basic research leading to improved exploratory and extraction techniques. It is basic information that is made available to all elements of the private sector, since it is developed in cooperation with them. And, perhaps most importantly, it establishes an ongoing pool of expertise on these basic research issues in colleges and universities throughout the country.

My own State of South Dakota has been able to participate in this program through the Mineral Research Institute located at the South Dakota School of Mines. Funding under this program has enabled a continuing program in basic research on issues like the separation of coal from slurry mediums in a more efficient form, providing for greater energy recovery and a reduction in allied water degradation problems associated with slurry operation. This is but one example of the kind of basic, down to earth research which provides us with the store of knowledge necessary to improve our ability to make maximum use of our limited natural resources in an environmentally safe manner.

The bill before us authorizes this desirable and necessary program for 5 years, providing a timeframe consistent with preferable long-range planning on these types of basic research. I urge my colleagues to join with me in passing this legislation to preserve an outstanding program of cooperation between the public and private sectors.●

● Mr. BOUCHER. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to commend the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs for acting quickly and responsibly to bring H.R. 4214 to the full House for its consideration. This important legislation, which I was pleased to cosponsor, will assure the continued operation of the mining and mineral resources research institutes at Virginia Polytechnic Institute and State University and at 30 other colleges and universities nationwide.

The Research Institutes Program established under the Surface Mining Control and Reclamation Act of 1977, provides a solid foundation for U.S. research and education in the mining and minerals industries. Through the provision of grants to qualifying institutes, this program supports improvements in mining and mineral technology which are essential to the productivity of our Nation's mineral industries, the development of expanded coal markets here and abroad, and the enhanced safety of mineworkers. The program also supports the education of mining and minerals specialists who will provide the leadership and knowledge necessary for the future viability of these industries.

Under the authority which would expire without the passage of H.R. 4214, Virginia Polytechnic Institute and State University hosts 1 of the 31 institutes. Through the institute and the associated Virginia Center for Coal and Energy Research, the university has been able to strengthen its instructional, research, and extension programs in the fields of mining and minerals engineering, supporting faculty and student research in areas such as coal chemistry and coal cleaning, mine subsidence prediction, and improvements in reclamation techniques. The Virginia institute has enjoyed the support of industry, and private donations for scholarships, fellowships, and assistantships have averaged approximately $50,000 annually.

Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the efforts of the gentleman from Arizona (Mr. McNULTY) to develop legislation which will reauthorize and improve the institutes program, and I am pleased to join in the strong bipartisan consensus in favor of this legislation.●

Mr. McNULTY. Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time, and I yield back the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from Arizona (Mr. McNULTY) that the House suspend the rules and pass the bill, H.R. 4214, as amended.

The question was taken; and (two-thirds having voted in favor thereof) the rules were suspended and the bill, as amended, was passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. McNULTY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks in the RECORD on the bill just passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arizona?

There was no objection.

COMMENDING THE HISTORIC AMERICAN BUILDINGS SURVEY

Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the Senate joint resolution (S.J. Res. 173) commending the Historic American Buildings Survey, a program of the National Park Service, Department of the Interior.

The Clerk read the title of the Senate joint resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. LUJAN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would ask the gentleman if my understanding is correct that there is no additional cost to this bill, that is just honoring the historic building survey.

Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield, the gentleman is absolutely correct.

Mr. LUJAN. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the Senate joint resolution, as follows:

S.J. RES. 173

Whereas the Historic American Buildings Survey has been documenting the architectural heritage of the United States with measured drawings, photographs, and historical data since 1933;

Whereas these records, stored in the Library of Congress for public use, along with the records created by a sister program, the Historic American Engineering Record, have added immeasurably to our knowledge and appreciation of the historic American built environment;

Whereas the Survey has proven to be an important training ground for thousands of architects, historians, and scholars who have worked to preserve our historic American architecture; and

Whereas the fiftieth anniversary of this program marks an appropriate time to commend the National Park Service on the Survey's past accomplishments as well as a time to look forward to the continuance of this important mission of recording the best examples of historic American architecture and engineering: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Historic American Buildings Survey be commended for its substantial contributions to our understanding of the history and heritage of this Nation.

COMMITTEE AMENDMENT

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: On page 2 in the clause which precedes the revolving clause strike out "National Park Service" and substitute "National Park Service, the Library of Congress, and the American Institute of Architects".

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. SEIBERLING).

Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Speaker, I simply want to say that the committee amendment would simply add recognition to the Library of Congress and the American Institute of Architects to the role of the National Park Service in the Historical American Buildings Survey.

Otherwise, it is the same as the Senate bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The Senate joint resolution was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The title of the Senate joint resolution was amended so as to read: "Joint resolution commending the Historic American Building Survey, a program of the National Park Service, Department of the Interior, the Library of Congress, and the American Institute of Architects."

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on the Senate joint resolution just passed.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

CONFERENCE REPORT ON S. 64, IRISH WILDERNESS ACT OF 1984

Mr. SEIBERLING submitted the following conference report and statement on the Senate bill (S. 64) to establish the Irish Wilderness in the Mark Twain National Forest, MO:

CONFERENCE REPORT (H. REPT. No. 98-663)

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 64), to establish the Irish Wilderness in the Mark Twain National Forest, Missouri, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House to the text of the bill and agree to the same with an amendment as follows:

In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted by the House amendment, substitute an amendment to the text of the bill after the enacting clause as follows:

That this Act may be cited as the "Irish Wilderness Act of 1984".

SEC. 2. (a) In furtherance of the purposes of the Wilderness Act (16 U.S.C. 1131-1136), certain lands in the Mark Twain National Forest, Missouri, which comprise approximately sixteen thousand five hundred acres, as generally depicted on a map entitled "Irish Wilderness", dated March 27, 1984, are hereby designated as wilderness and shall be known as the Irish Wilderness.

(b) Subject to valid existing rights, the wilderness area designated under subsection (a) shall be administered by the Secretary of Agriculture (hereinafter in this Act referred to as the "Secretary") in accordance with the provisions of the Wilderness Act of 1964 (16 U.S.C. 1131-1136) governing areas designated by that Act as wilderness, except that any reference in such provisions to the effective date of the Wilderness Act shall be deemed to be a reference to the effective date of this Act.

(c) As soon as practicable after the date of the enactment of this Act, the Secretary shall submit a map and legal description of the wilderness area designated by subsection (a) to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources of the Senate and the Committees on Agriculture and Interior and Insular Affairs of the House of Representatives. Such map and legal description shall have the same force and effect as if included in this Act, except that any clerical or typographical error in such map or legal description may be corrected. The Secretary shall place such map and legal description on file, and make them available for public inspection, in the office of the Chief fo the Forest Service, Department of Agriculture.

SEC. 3. The provision of Public Law 98-146 (97 Stat. 919, at 921), reading ": Provided further, That subject to valid existing rights, no appropriation herein made shall be used by the Secretary of the Interior for the processing or issuance of prospecting permits in certain lands in the Mark Twain National Forest, Missouri, which comprise approximately 17,562 acres, as generally depicted on a map entitled 'Irish Wilderness—Proposed', dated December 1981" is hereby repealed.

JOINT EXPLANATORY STATEMENT OF THE COMMITTEE OF CONFERENCE

The managers on the part of the House and the Senate at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 64) to establish the Irish Wilderness in the Mark Twain National Forest, Missouri, submit the following joint statement to the House and Senate in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon by the managers and recommended in the accompanying conference report:

The House amendment deleted approximately 2,000 acres of the Irish Wilderness as proposed by the Senate bill, based upon the determination of the House as to the resolution of land management choices for the entire area under consideration.

The Senate recedes from its disagreement to the amendment of the House with an amendment which is a substitute to the text of the bill as a resolution of the land management choices for the entire area under consideration. The differences among the Senate bill, the House amendment, and the substitute agreed to in conference are noted below.

The House deleted approximately 2,000 acres from the Irish Wilderness as proposed by the Senate. Of primary concern to the House in its decision to delete the acreage was its concern over mineral values. The conferees agreed to exclude areas proposed in the Senate bill equaling approximately 1,070 acres as defined on the map referenced in the amendment which contain potentially significant mineral values. The decision of the conferees was based upon their judgment of the best overall resource management choices for the proposed area.

In those areas which were designated as wilderness in the Senate bill, but not designated as wilderness in the Conference agreement, the conferees intend that mining and associated support activities be permitted. It is also the intent of the conferees, that except as necessary to allow mining and associated support activities, these areas shall be managed by the Forest Service to preserve their wilderness characteristics.

As part of the overall resolution of land management choices for this area, the conferees included an amendment which repeals the language in the 1984 Interior Appropriation Act which prohibits the issuance of prospecting permits within the boundaries of the original Senate passed bill. The amendment thereby allows such permits to be issued for the lands not designated as wilderness by the Conference agreement. In the absence of this amendment prospecting permit issuance within the lands excluded from wilderness would be prohibited until October 1, 1984.

PRESIDENT REAGAN SHOULD TAKE RESPONSIBILITY FOR HIS OWN MISTAKES

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Georgia (Mr. LEVITAS) is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. LEVITAS. Mr. Speaker, I take this time to make some observations on President Reagan's two recent comments relating to this desire for bipartisanship and congressional support in foreign policy and his memory-lapsed condemnation of the Congress because it—rather than he—should take the blame for the flawed policies that failed in Lebanon.

It disturbs me that President Reagan's recollection of his historic facts is faulty and his understanding of the Constitution is in error.

And it disturbs me, Mr. Speaker, because our President is working against himself and undermines his credibility. We should let partisanship end at the water's edge. I do firmly believe we need and should have a bipartisan and congressionally supported foreign policy. But I think that it is, at best, hypocritical for the President to have made the allegations he made, specifically with respect to the situation in Lebanon.

Who sent the marines to Lebanon?

Who gave them an unwinnable political task?

Who kept the marines in the shooting gallery?

What the President failed to acknowledge was, in fact, he had bipartisan support from Congress. And it is probably correct to say that the Congress should bear some of the blame, but the blame that Congress should bear is the blame for going along with the President when he asked for the additional 18 months to keep the marines in Lebanon in an unwinnable, death-inviting position and role. President Reagan's request for implementation of that flawed policy and indeed the cooperation of the Congress in granting his request is what led to a situation that resulted in the unneeded loss of American lives which could have otherwise been avoided.

Mr. Speaker, the fact of the matter is that the President and his administration were responsible for our policy in Lebanon and its implementation. It simply creates even greater lack of credibility for the President to say, "It is not my fault. I didn't do it. They did." That is not being the man he is.

The fact of the matter is, Mr. Speaker, that as recently as last fall the President of the United States, in response to the report of the Pentagon's Commission that studied the disaster involving the marines in Lebanon and whose findings held certain officers accountable, the President said, "It is my responsibility for what happened there." That was being a man, and he appeared to be noble. Has he forgotten he took responsibility or was that just for the moment?

The President took the responsibility, yet unlike other occasions when a person assumes responsbility for a failure, there apparently was no consequence attached to the responsibility he assumed.

When the public debate continued as to the wisdom of the President's policy of keeping the marines in Lebanon—a policy in which his own administration and his own high advisers were vigorously and publicly at odds with each other—that debate was countered by the President saying, "We should not surrender in Lebanon." Yet, within a matter of weeks, the President has withdrawn the American marines from Lebanon.

Even at that time an unwillingness to acknowledge the responsibility for the failure of the policy. Secretary of Defense Weinberger had made the comment that I recall that this was not a withdrawal, it was simply a redeployment 2 or 3 miles to the west. Well, 2 or 3 miles to the west, Mr. Speaker, was in the Mediterranean Sea.

If Caspar Weinberger had been Napoleon's Secretary of Defense, he could have called the French withdrawal from the gates of Moscow a redeployment.

There has been an unwillingness at any point for this administration and the President to face up to his failed policies and his responsibilities for what happened in Lebanon. He has again and again tried to blame others and at the same time call for congressional and bipartisan cooperation in a foreign policy.

Yes, the President may have had a point. Congress has to share some of the blame, but the blame that Congress should share, if any, was the blame of going along with the President when our better judgment should have told us otherwise. The time for Congress to act under our constitutional responsibilities and under the War Powers Act was at the time the Presidential request for the additional 18 months came in. And I regret that some of the leaders of our House went along with the President then. I think the error of their ways is now being seen because, with insult piled on top of injury, they are being condemned by the President for lack of cooperation, when indeed it was that congressional cooperation which gave the President the opportunity to carry out his policies.

Bipartisanship and congressional cooperation in foreign policy does not mean that the elected Congress should simply fall over and play dead in face of what a President calls on them to do. That is true whether the President is Lyndon Johnson, or Ronald Reagan.

The Constitution of the United States places responsibilities on the elected Congress to make decisions relating to whether or not we shall deploy forces and whether or not we shall place our troops in positions where American blood can be shed and American policies implemented. We have the high constitutional duty to legislate and raise armies and taxes to pay for them and the sole constitutional power to declare war. Did President Reagan's advisers fail to tell him that or did they misinform him or did he forget?

In this instance, the President asked for and received from Congress on Lebanon the 18-month extension. I voted against it at the time. Many of us voted against it even though the Speaker of this House as the Republican leader called upon us to vote for it, because I agreed with those who said that we were in an unwinnable situation; that our marines were given a political job they are not trained for. I am not opposed to using American force where it is necessary to implement a vital American policy, but if we are going to use force, if we are going to commit American troops, we ought to commit them to a situation in which they have a winnable opportunity. These 1,600 marines, committed into the midst of a decades-old civil war, still in Beirut long after their original purpose had been fulfilled, which was the withdrawal of the PLO from Beirut, found themselves in an untenable situation. They were sitting ducks, to be shot at, as in a shooting gallery. They could not do anything to change the situation except spill their blood. And as was said at the time of that debate on the President's request, "If we are there to fight, we are too few, and if we are there to die, we are too many."

Because of what happened in Lebanon, I think the President of the United States now has a conscience qualm about his policy which many of his own advisers and many Members of the House and of the Senate urged him to avoid. Now he is looking for someone else to place the blame on. History records the decision was his.

Yes, we do need to have a bipartisan foreign policy and we need to have a foreign policy in which the President and the Congress work cooperatively, but we each must assume the responsibility for our own actions, because if we do not, we do not even begin with the factual basis of credibility for what we are doing. And it is this lack of credibility and believability, not only by the American people, but by the rest of the world, that places in jeopardy our policies.

It is a shame that the President, at a time when he is seeking and needs the support of the Congress and bipartisan support in pursuit of his policies, should have so hypocritically and so partisanly and so falsely accused the Congress of bearing the responsibility for what happened in Lebanon.

It was just this morning, Mr. Speaker, in the Washington Post that an article appeared, written by Lou Cannon, a reporter for the Washington Post. Mr. Cannon has had a reputation of being a somewhat pro-Reagan devotee, someone who has from his days in California tended to be sympathetic with and understanding of Mr. Reagan's views on matters.

The headline over this article, written by Lou Cannon, says: "In Pursuing Bipartisanship, President Follows Partisan Course." And he reminds us on occasion after occasion that what the President has said in the past are at odds with what he said last week. And he concludes with these words:

> These are the partisan words of the man who now urges Members of Congress to submerge their doubts and fears in a new bipartisan consensus. Small wonder that many of them do not want to go along.

I have supported this President in foreign affairs matters, nuclear arms, arms control matters, Central America and other issues, because I thought he was right, but when the President is wrong, he should acknowledge that fact and not condemn the Congress for his own flawed policies, which resulted in failure.

So, therefore, Mr. Speaker, I include in the RECORD, the article by Lou Cannon which appeared in this morning's Washington Post.

The article follows:

IN PURSUING BIPARTISANSHIP, PRESIDENT FOLLOWS PARTISAN COURSE

(By Lou Cannon)

President Reagan startled even some of his advisers last week when he appealed for a national bipartisan consensus on foreign policy in almost the same breath that he blamed Congress for losing Lebanon.

One strategist said the dual appeal was "bizarre," and another acknowledged that it "sounded like the president was talking out of both sides of his mouth."

In fact, he was. Ever since he nominally took responsibility for the suicide truck bombing last Oct. 23 that killed 241 U.S. servicemen in Beirut, Reagan has faulted everyone but himself for the failure of his policy and its tragic cost to the peacekeeping forces.

Ignoring divisions within his administration that must certainly have sent louder signals to Syria than did the complaints of any congressional critic, the president has sprinkled blame on Congress, the media and foreign governments for failures that the Long commission, a respected group of military investigators, laid at his doorstep.

The culmination came at a news conference last Wednesday night when Reagan said congressional objections to his Lebanon policy had served to "stimulate the terrorists and urge them on to further attacks."

He followed this remarkable accusation with a Friday speech here in which he argued that Congress should support the details and principles of administration foreign policy. His basic message seemed to be that Congress should do what it is told, which pretty well describes what happened in the debate about Lebanon.

Last September, after snipers had begun picking off Marines deployed on low ground around the Beirut airport, the White House asked Congress for an 18-month commitment to keep the Marines in Lebanon. House Speaker Thomas P. (Tip) O'Neill Jr. (D-Mass.), normally a Reagan foe, came to the president's aid in the tradition of bipartisanship.

Impressed by a briefing given by national security affairs adviser Robert C. McFarlane, O'Neill braved the ire of younger, more restive Democrats and backed Reagan. A White House official told me then that the thorniest objections had come from Republicans, especially Senate Majority Leader Howard H. Baker, Jr. (Tenn.), who was skeptical about the continued deployment.

In the aftermath of the Oct. 23 tragedy, when a shaken Reagan insisted that "vital interests" of the United States were involved in Lebanon and that keeping the Marines there was "central to our credibility on a global scale," the Joint Chiefs of Staff lobbied for their withdrawal. The chiefs, who had taken this stand before the bombing, were supported by Defense Secretary Caspar W. Weinberger, White House chief of staff James A. Baker III and most of the Republican congressional leadership.

In February, in an interview with The Washington Post, Reagan said of the then-forthcoming withdrawal, "We are redeploying because, once the terrorist attacks started, there was no way that we could really contribute to the original mission by staying there as a target, just hunkering down and waiting for further attacks."

His military experts had been saying that for several months, but Reagan had not listened. He accepted the contention of McFarlane and Secretary of State George P. Shultz just progress was being made in Lebanon. Just before he approved the withdrawal, Reagan denounced O'Neill for want to "surrender."

A senior administration official who briefed reporters on the president's speech last week suggested that members of Congress should keep quiet when U.S. lives are at risk and voice complaints in letters to the president. Asked how Reagan squared this appeal with his record of public partisanship, the offical said: "I think there's been a certain evolution in his thinking."

Indeed there has been. While still a Democrat in the early 1950s, Reagan broke with President Harry S Truman over halfway measures he believed were being employed in the Korean War. Truman fired Gen. Douglas MacArthur for insubordination, and the general declared, "There is no substitute for victory." Reagan approvingly quoted these words last week, but they have a hollow ring after Lebanon.

Reagan was critical of President Lyndon B. Johnson for waging a "no-win war" in Vietnam. He criticized President Gerald R. Ford and Henry A. Kissinger for "the giveaway of the Panama Canal." In his 1976 campaign against Ford, Reagan declared repeatedly, "Never again will we allow our boys to be sent to fight and die in a war that we do not intend to win."

The refrain continued in the 1980 campaign. On Feb. 15 of that year, Reagan said, "Our foreign policy should aim to avoid both retreat and the need for military intervention. We must have ways to help our friends and to defend our interests without sending in the Marines. We used to have such a capacity. Jimmy Carter had the option of building on that strength but chose weakness and illusion instead."

These are the partisan words of the man who now urges members of Congress to submerge their doubts and fears in a new bipartisan consensus. Small wonder that many of them do not want to go along.

THE CONGRESS

The SPEAKER, pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Oregon (Mr. WEAVER) is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. WEAVER. Mr. Speaker, I am proud to be a Member of this body. I think it is the greatest representational body in the history of the world. It is the bulwark of our democracy. And yet I fear that the Congress of the United States has fallen to a low esteem. I see in the papers day after day that we are berated for such things as raising our own pay, when we do, which is not often; we are berated for taking junkets to investigate conditions in other lands. And in the papers this weekend and in speeches, President Reagan seems bent on running against the Congress, as if he senses that, somehow or other, Congress is someone that is so low in the public esteem that it makes a good whipping-boy or scapegoat. I note that President Reagan also intends, according to the Wall Street Journal today, to run on a hawkish foreign policy. Now, I believe—I hope—that he misreads the American people, that the American people do not want the foreign ventures that he has continuously gotten us into in Lebanon, Central America, and elsewhere. So I am not sure that he is right on Congress, either. I hope not.

But I remember last year, during the pay raise debate in this House, several Members, very distinguished Members, rose in the Chamber to defend the pay raise because, they said, this body needs to assert itself, this body, the Members of this body, need to believe in themselves and in the Congress and, as a symbol of that, have the courage to raise their own pay.

Now, the reason we are afraid to raise our own pay is a very simple one; that is, the people whom we represent do not like to see us enriching ourselves on the public trough. I do not blame them. It makes sense. But what I see is a double standard in this issue because there is another group of people in this country that also has the power to raise its own pay, and that group is corporation executive officers, the presidents of large corporations and the top vice presidents of the large corporations, who also sit on the boards of directors, who make the decisions on raising pay. And that group does not have itself in low esteem. It has itself in very high esteem.

Last week, the Ford Motor Co. disclosed salaries and bonuses and stock options, which are the same as salaries, they are given for services rendered. And we see that Philip Caldwell, the chairman of the Ford Motor Co., was paid $1.42 million in annual salary, and he exercised stock options that had been given to him for another $5.8 million profit, and so his total income for that year was $7.31 million.

Donald E. Peterson, Ford's president, earned—at least they say he earned—$3.7 million last year.

Now, let us look at those salaries. If Mr. Caldwell's $7.3 million is compared to the working people of this country, he is making $3,700 an hour. That is a 1,000 times the minimum wage. He makes $140,000 a week, he makes $28,000 a day. If he drops a pencil, it costs about $60. If he goes out for a quick cup of coffee, that is $900 lost to the company.

We have in unemployment compensation for these high executives not what American workers get, what they have paid into and ordered to draw unemployment when they are thrown out of their jobs, but corporation officers get huge severance pay amounting to millions of dollars in many instances, and when a company is taken over, the taken-over company quickly meets, the board of directors quickly meets, and offers golden parachutes to its executives, and many companies have given their executives millions of dollars in severance pay for their unemployment compensation.

The tax cuts that President Reagan pushed through the Congress in 1981 mean that these pay levels of millions of dollars a year are taxed at far lower percentages than they used to be. To Mr. Caldwell, the Reagan tax cut was probably worth $2 million or $3 million, where, if you made under $10,000 last year, the tax cut was actually not a cut but it cost you $400.

We are fast shifting hundreds of billions of dollars from the middle-income people to the wealthy of this country, partly due to these huge corporate salaries. In my own Northwest, in reward for helping bring about the WPPSS nuclear project fiasco, which cost us in the Northwest billions and billions of dollars, the chairman of the board of the Pacific Power and Light, Mr. Frisbee, was awarded with a salary increase of over $100,000, bringing his pay to $381,000 a year.

John Fery, of Boise Cascade, has an annual pay of $168,000.

To reward the officers of the banks that have loaned billions of dollars, tens of billions of dollars, hundreds of billions of dollars to foreign countries that they cannot get paid back, as a reward for making those loans that have potentially cost the American taxpayers that money, the Chase Manhattan Bank pays its president, Willard Butcher, $636,000, and the Citicorp pays its top officer, Walter Wriston, $1,157,000.

Headlines in the papers a couple weeks ago said Borman, president of Eastern Airlines, took a pay cut. He did. He certainly did. His pay was cut to $280,000 a year.

And Peter Grace, the man who said the Government was extravagant and wasted too much money, was paid last year $917,000 by his company.

I would go on. But I compare this to the congressional pay and the fact that Congress is berated when we have not even had a cost-of-living increase, or only one in 6 years—and I do not defend pay raises here for Congress or anyone else. I am talking now about the esteem with which this body is held by the people.

I say that if the story were told that perhaps the people would see where their money is really going, because when they buy a product, a Ford car, or whatever product these corporations make, they must pay the exorbitant salaries of these top executives. To make these salaries accountable, I believe that the stockholders should be required to vote on salaries—and I mean all of the stockholders, not just the proxies, but the majority stockholders should actually be required to vote on a salary that is 10 or 20 times the average pay of corporation workers. It is not asking too much. And we should again put back in the tax schedules that which would make these people pay at least a part, a fair share, of their exorbitant incomes in taxes.

Now, the other thing that Congress is berated for, one of many, are the junkets. I do not go on junkets, and I do not go on junkets for a number of reasons.

I do not like to travel on airplanes. The main reason I do not go is that they are very hard work; they work 12 and 14 hours a day and perhaps have to change airlines and places to stay two or three times a day. They are tough work, and I would prefer to be back in my district in Oregon anyway, seeing my people.

But there is another branch of the U.S. Government whose top officers take a lot of junkets, but we do not read about that in the paper. That is the military. I was astounded and disgusted to read in the paper this week where the general officers of the Army and Air Force have leased 120 Lear Jets, each one costing $4 million, so that they can fly at their own free will anywhere around the world or in this country that they wish at any time. Probably to their hunting lodges or wherever.

I compare this to the junkets Congress takes. I read where it cost last year, Members of Congress charged $4 million in expenses for junkets, and I think that that is 535 Members of the Congress, both bodies. I think that the cost of these 120 Lear Jets, so that the generals can fly around the country, will be about $100 million a year, or 25 times as much. But I do not read about that. It bothers me deeply that other branches of Government are allowed these extravagances without criticism, when the Congress, in doing its duty and performing its work, learning about what the billions of dollars in appropriations bills must be spent for, are berated for something that these generals do with $100 million a year just for the planes themselves.

I think of the fact that a general or an admiral has a chauffered-driven limousine; has a cook; private dining room; and I realize that the American people do not know that Congress has none of those things. I myself do not even own a car, I walk to wherever I am going.

I remember once, in my district, I went to a grade school. I was going to speak to the fourth-grade class. I think that is a wonderful experience as kids are some of the most bright, earnest, and questioning people I have ever met. I drove up in a 1978 Chevette, which is my car in Oregon, and the kids came rushing out of the school and I asked the teacher: "Gee, that was very nice, it was very exciting to see the kids running out screaming, I wonder why they rushed out before I could go in?"

The teacher said they wanted to see the big, chauffeur-driven limousine you came up in. I realized that many constituents think that is the way we live back here: That we have limousines, that we have all these perquisites which we do not, and do not ask for; we do not want them.

But it is strange to me that the Congress is berated for the things we do not have while the military and corporate officers are left uncriticized for the things they do. I believe, Mr. Speaker, that a fundamental issue is at stake. I use the junkets and the pay rise as simply manifestations of what is going on. That is, if indeed the Congress has sunk to a low in esteem so that we are not only criticized for what we do but what we do not do, then our representative government is at stake. Once the people lose faith in their Congress, then our democracy has not much longer to go.

President Reagan was saying the other day that Congress should not debate foreign policy; that once the decision is made to send marines in Lebanon, we should keep quiet. In effect saying that the Congress has no business in this issue. Such issues of life and death and certainly life and death to the marines who did die in Lebanon.

But greater things at stake in terms of committing this country to places throughout the world and a healthy debate must continue in the Congress. If it does not, or if we are silenced, then if Congress fails and fails in the minds of the American people, then we will have, whether benign or malign, a dictatorship, where the President will assume all functions.

Indeed, I saw the Secretary of State, Mr. Shultz, say to a congressional committee the other day, he did not know what was in their minds for even discussing an issue, and he said he hoped Congress would appropriate the money so they would not have to go around Congress to spend the money in places like Central America without our permission; without law.

I say, Mr. Speaker, the American people must be told the truth, that Congress does not drive around in limousines; they are among the hardest-working citizens in this country and that the press, which constantly berates us, and I think they do, it is on a bipartisan manner; it is not one party over the other. They do because it is possible that it simply reflects public opinion which, I am sorry to say, is quite likely. But if the public were told the truth that the Congress does its best, then we can hold our heads high; we can keep our democracy alive. We can revive our democracy and continue to make it stronger.

Mr. Speaker, I am reading now a book called "Vietnam" by Mr. Karnow, and I was reading about the years 1962, 1963, 1964, and 1965 when our commitment was being built up in Vietnam. I was saddened, disgusted, and outraged to see all the lies that were told at that time by the executive branch about our involvement in Vietnam. The writer had the documentation: The memos and other materials that became public in years later, so he knew that they were lies. I see now the very same thing occurring in Central America. You could change Vietnam for Nicaragua in that book and you would hardly have to change another word in the Government subterfuge of putting our commitments into places like Nicaragua and Honduras—and so, I have only this to say in conclusion, Mr. Speaker. That is that the Congress must assert itself; must play its coequal role; the people must believe in the Congress, because between the Congress and nothing, is dictatorship. Between the Congress and nothing is a runaway Executive, putting our troops anywhere they wish; bringing us closer to war in all parts of the world.

I just, for one, want to say, in conclusion, that I am proud to be a Member of this body, very proud. It has been the greatest honor of my life. I want this Congress to be as it should be and as it has been, the greatest legislative body in the history of the world and play its coequal role. I hope that the public will affirm that and believe in this Congress so that we can maintain a strong democracy.

THE PRESIDENT'S ARMS CONTROL PROPOSAL

(Mr. CHANDLER asked and was given permission to extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD and to include extraneous matter.)

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. Speaker, the President of the United States last Wednesday in his nationally televised press conference unveiled his latest and perhaps most ambitious arms control proposal. The draft treaty which Vice President BUSH will bring to the U.N. Committee on Disarmament in Geneva in 2 weeks calls for a worldwide ban on the production and stockpiling of chemical weapons. The timeliness of this proposal cannot be overlooked. Reports of the use of chemical agents in battle are spreading, and the Soviet Union, in spite of stalemates elsewhere, has indicated a willingness to negotiate on this subject. President Reagan is to be commended for seizing this excellent opportunity to address a critical and difficult area of arms control. I rise today to offer my unequivocal and wholehearted support for this outstanding proposal.

Last year, when this body debated funding for the modernization of our own chemical weapons stockpile, I found myself faced with a painful dilemma. The horrible nature of these weapons is undeniable, and to authorize their production is distasteful, indeed. At the same time, Congress cannot simply ignore the issue and wish it away. So long as our adversaries posses the ability to use chemical weapons against us and our allies, we must maintain the means to deter them.

Now, President Reagan has offered the Nation—and the world—an alternative. Negotiation of a worldwide chemical weapons ban would relieve us of the choice between two evils: Supporting we find morally repugnant, or surrendering the Nation to the threat of losing a chemical war. I hope that my colleagues will recognize the importance of the President's proposal, and take this opportunity to join as statesmen in support of his plan. It is time we put the era of chemical warfare behind us.

AMENDMENTS

Under clause 6 of rule XXIII, proposed amendments were submitted as follows:

S. 373

By Mr. FUQUA:
—Strike out title I (beginning on page 1, line 3, and ending on page 14, line 23) and insert in lieu thereof the following:

TITLE I—ARCTIC RESEARCH AND POLICY

SHORT TITLE

SEC. 101. This title may be cited as the "Arctic Research and Policy Act of 1984".

FINDINGS AND PURPOSES

SEC. 102. (a) The Congress finds and declares that—

(1) the Arctic, onshore and offshore, contains vital energy resources that can reduce the Nation's dependence on foreign oil and improve the national balance of payments;

(2) as the Nation's only common border with the Soviet Union, the Arctic is critical to national defense;

(3) the renewable resources of the Arctic, specifically fish and other seafood, represent one of the Nation's greatest commerical assets;

(4) Arctic conditions directly affect global weather patterns and must be understood in order to promote better agricultural management throughout the United States;

(5) industrial pollution not originating in the Arctic region collects in the polar air mass, has the potential to disrupt global weather patterns, and must be controlled through international cooperation and consultation;

(6) the Arctic is a natural laboratory for research into human health and adaptation, physical and psychological, to climates of extreme cold and isolation and may provide information crucial for future defense needs;

(7) atmospheric conditions peculiar to the Arctic make the Arctic a unique testing ground for research into high latitutde communications, which is likely to be crucial for future defense needs;

(8) Arctic marine technology is critical to cost-effective recovery and transportation of energy resources and to the national defense;

(9) the United States has important security, economic, and environmental interests in developing and maintaining a fleet of icebreaking vessels capable of operating effectively in the heavy ice regions of the Arctic;

(10) most Arctic-rim countries, particularly the Soviet Union, possess Arctic technologies far more advanced than those currently available in the United States;

(11) Federal Arctic research is fragmented and uncoordinated at the present time, leading to the neglect of certain areas of research and to unnecessary duplication of effort in other areas of research;

(12) improved logistical coordination and support for Arctic research and better dissemination of research data and information is necessary to increase the efficiency and utility of national Arctic research efforts;

(13) a comprehensive national policy and program plan to organize and fund currently neglected scientific research with respect to the Arctic is necessary to fulfill national objectives in Arctic research;

(14) the Federal Government, in cooperation with State and local governments, should focus its efforts on the collection and characterization of basic data related to biological, materials, and geophysical phenomena in the Arctic;

(15) research into the long-range health, environmental, and social effects of development in the Arctic is necessary to mitigate the adverse consequences of that development to the land and its residents;

(16) Arctic research expands knowledge of the Arctic, which can enhance the lives of Arctic residents, increase opportunities for international cooperation among Arctic-rim countries, and facilitate the formulation of national policy for the Arctic; and

(17) the Alaskan Arctic provides an essential habitat for marine mammals, migratory waterfowl, and other forms of wildlife which are important to the Nation and which are essential to Arctic residents.

(b) The purposes of this title are—

(1) to establish national policy, priorities, and goals and to provide a Federal program plan for basic and applied scientific research with respect to the Arctic, including natural resources and materials, physical and biological sciences, and social and behavioral sciences;

(2) to establish an Arctic Research Commission to promote Arctic research and to recommend Arctic research policy;

(3) to designate the National Science Foundation as the lead agency responsible for implementing Arctic research policy; and

(4) to establish an Interagency Arctic Research Policy Committee to develop a national Arctic research policy and a five year plan to implement that policy.

ARCTIC RESEARCH COMMISSION

SEC. 103. (a) The President shall establish an Arctic Research Commission (hereafter referred to as the "Commission").

SENATE—Monday, April 9, 1984

(Legislative day of Monday, March 26, 1984)

The Senate met at 11 a.m., on the expiration of the recess, and was called to order by the President pro tempore (Mr. THURMOND).

PRAYER

The Chaplain, the Reverend Richard C. Halverson, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Let us pray.

Let us be silent for a moment in memory of Senator Frank Church and his loved ones.

*Thus saith the Lord God, the holy one of Israel * * * in quietness and in confidence shall be your strength.* * * *.—Isaiah 30: 15.

Be still and know that I am God * * *.—Psalm 46: 10.

God of peace, we live in a noisy world. We are surrounded by noise, engulfed by noise, assaulted by noise, immersed in noise—aircraft overhead, the roar of traffic with its horns and sirens, the clatter and whir of office machines, even music is noisy. But perhaps worst of all, the cacophony of words—millions of them—like an avalanche burying us. We remember when noise was the exception—silence the rule. Now noise is normal—silence the distraction. We are startled by silence but we are starved for silence and we are losing our way.

Loving Lord, help us to find our way to Thee. Help us to seek silence that we may hear Thee. God of exquisite silence, as Thou didst speak to Elijah, not in the wind, not in the earthquake, not in the fire, but in a still small voice, speak to us. Help us to find quietness—and in it Thee. In Jesus' name. Amen.

RECOGNITION OF THE MAJORITY LEADER

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The majority leader is recognized.

Mr. BAKER. I thank the Chair.

COMMENDING THE CHAPLAIN OF THE SENATE

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, once again I commend the Chaplain on his prayer this morning. As a middle-aged grandparent who has had his two young grandsons in residence for the last 2 weeks, I can attest to the fact that silence is the exception rather than the rule.

Mr. President, let me say also that I have seldom had a more happy time in my existence than their presence in Washington during that time. Those remarks are not meant to be a criticism, but rather a comment and commentary on the Chaplain's good prayer this morning.

SENATE SCHEDULE

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, after the leader time today, there will be special orders in favor of three Senators and then time for the transaction of routine morning business until 1 p.m.

After that, the Senate will resume consideration of the Federal Boat Safety Act. It is expected that the Finance Committee, perhaps under the cosponsorship of the chairman and the ranking member, Senators DOLE and LONG, will offer, as an amendment to the boat bill, the Finance Committee bill of some 1,300 pages in length dealing with the so-called revenue package.

I do not know, Mr. President, how late we will be in today, tomorrow, or any other day this week. I intend to confer with the minority leader on that subject and then, of course, with the two managers. The leadership on this side is prepared to stay as long as they feel they can accomplish useful work, which may mean that there will be late evenings, or it may not. That depends on the conferences I have just referred to, in part.

Mr. President, the Senate is scheduled to go out on Thursday or Friday of this week. I say Thursday because it is my understanding that the resolution which will come over from the House of Representatives will provide for an adjournment either on Thursday or Friday for the Easter recess.

How that works, Mr. President, depends also on the pace of business that we are able to establish and the wishes of the two managers of the tax amendment to the boat bill.

Mr. President, there may be other matters that we can take up temporarily. An accumulating number of measures are on the calendar that appear on first blush to lend themselves to short time limitations, maybe even action by unanimous consent. So I am asking the staff on this side of the aisle to explore the possibility of clearing some of those measures to be dealt with this week if possible before we proceed to the pending business on the several days that we will be in session this week.

I will try to tighten up that statement of the schedule of the Senate after I have consulted with the minority leader and with the two managers of the bill, with the staff, and other Senators. For the moment, Mr. President, I think that is about as well as I can state it.

Once again, Senators should expect to be in each day this week, with the possibility of late evenings. I will have a further announcement to make later.

DEATH OF FORMER SENATOR FRANK CHURCH, OF IDAHO

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I am sure I share with every Senator the sadness of the Senate in learning of the death of our former colleague from Idaho, Senator Frank Church.

At the appropriate time, I intend to yield a portion of my leader time to the distinguished senior Senator from Idaho so he may formally notify the Senate in that respect. Before I do so, I wish to yield to the minority leader so that he may claim his time under the standing order.

VITIATION OF SPECIAL ORDER FOR SENATOR MURKOWSKI

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, before I yield to the minority leader, I am advised that one of the three Senators has no need for the special order in his favor. Therefore, I ask unanimous consent that the special order in favor of Senator MURKOWSKI be vitiated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SYMMS). Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, may I ask the minority leader if he would object to my reserving the remainder of my time so I may yield to the Senator from Idaho at the conclusion of the minority leader's time?

Mr. BYRD. Not at all.

RECOGNITION OF THE MINORITY LEADER

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The minority leader is recognized.

Mr. BYRD. I thank the Chair.

DEATH OF FORMER SENATOR FRANK CHURCH, OF IDAHO

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I associate myself with the remarks of the distinguished majority leader with respect to the passing of our late former colleague Senator Church.

THE NATION HAS LOST A VOICE OF REASON IN FOREIGN POLICY

Mr. President, the Nation has lost an eloquent and reasonable voice in foreign policy matters with the death this past weekend of a former colleague, Frank Church.

For 24 years, as a U.S. Senator from Idaho, Frank Church was in the forefront of the major foreign policy issues of our time—the Vietnam war, arms control, the Panama Canal Treaties, and intense scrutiny given to the activities of the Central Intelligence Agency.

Despite his failing health, due to the debilitating effects of pancreatic cancer, Frank Church continued to give us the benefit of his wisdom and foresight. In an article appearing in the March 11, 1984, edition of the Washington Post, the former chairman of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations spelled out very forcefully and reasonably why our present policy toward Central America was doomed to failure.

Entitled, "We Must Learn To Live with Revolutions: If the U.S. Can Befriend China, It Can Accept Nicaragua," Senator Church pointed out that the United States, for the past 40 years, has had difficulty understanding that Third World revolutions are primarily nationalist, not Communist.

In 1966, Frank Church warned that "no nation, not even our own, possesses an arsenal so large or a treasury so rich as to dampen down the fires of smoldering revolution throughout the whole awakening world." These are words we have failed so often in not heeding. These are words which are particularly relevant to the crisis we confront in Central America today.

Mr. President, Erma and I offer our condolences to Senator Church's wife, Bethine, and to their two sons, Forrest and Chase. Bethine has been a staunch marriage partner and political partner of our former colleague. She shared much adversity with Senator Church, going back to his first bout with cancer in 1947, shortly after they were married.

Fortunately for the Nation, surgery and radiation treatments gave Frank Church 37 more years with us after doctors had given him only 6 more months to live. While this is a time of sadness, it is also a time of thankfulness that we had the benefit of his wisdom during his 24 years of service to his State and Nation while in the U.S. Senate, and his continued service once he left this body.

Mr. President, before I proceed under the standing order for the recognition of the two leaders, I think it appropriate if I yield the floor to the distinguished Senator from Idaho (Mr. McCLURE) so that he may proceed to speak with regard to our former colleague's passing.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Idaho.

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, we pause today to remember and commemorate the life of our colleague, Frank Church, who served in this body with great distinction from 1956 through 1980.

While I know that many of my colleagues have warm and vivid memories of their relationship with Frank, I hold some that are particularly special. For 8 years, Frank and I served together as Senators for Idaho. And during that time, I grew to understand and respect him for his steadfastness in the beliefs that he held.

In remembering the life and career of Frank Church, several things come to mind. He was an outstanding public speaker—one of the highest order and the best traditions in this body. His love for words and his skill at using them moved the opinions of many in this body, in Idaho, and across the Nation.

His speaking skills first gained national prominence when, as a junior at Boise High School, he won the American Legion's national oratory contest. In 1952, he was selected as the keynote speaker at the Idaho State Democratic Convention. Prior to his candidacy for the Senate, he taught public speaking at what is now Boise State University.

Frank's speaking ability was respected by both sides of the aisle. In 1958, Vice President Nixon selected Frank to deliver George Washington's Farewell Address here in the Senate Chamber, and he did it with memorable style. Two years later, Frank was chosen to deliver the keynote address at the Democratic National Convention in Los Angeles.

Another characteristic of Frank's career that stands out is his strong convictions. Frank fought for and spoke out on the issues he believed in with vigor and with unswerving perseverence. That, to me, is one of the highest standards that an elected official can achieve.

Frank will also be remembered for his work on environmental issues. Much of his knowledge of our wild lands came, of course, from his upbringing in Idaho. But his concerns were not limited to Idaho alone.

Frank played a significant role in the passage of the Wilderness Act of 1964, establishing the National Wilderness Preservation System. Legislation he introduced in 1967 established the National Wild and Scenic Rivers System, which has led to the protection of some of our country's most beautiful stretches of water.

While Frank was deeply involved in both national and international affairs, he remained loyal to his native Idaho—and for this he will long be remembered back home.

Frank and I did not always see eye to eye on a lot of issues. Frank's roots were in the Democratic politics from his earliest days, and my background is a Republican one. So, understandably, we ended up differing with each other a good deal of the time.

But when issues came before the Senate that affected the State of Idaho, our political differences took a back seat to the overriding duty we both had to our State. We worked particularly closely on legislation creating the Hells Canyon National Recreation Area in 1978, as well as the Central Idaho Wildernsss Act of 1980.

That act gave wilderness designation to over 2.2 million acres of land surrounding the Salmon River. Historically, this magnificent stretch of water has been know as the "River of No Return," and the scenic qualities of the land surrounding it are legend. That wilderness area now bears Frank's name, and it is a fitting tribute to his concern and work on behalf of our Nation's wild lands. I know just how deeply he appreciated the support that his colleagues in this body gave to the prompt passage of that act.

In addition to his work on wilderness issues, many memories we have of Frank Church are tied to the important statements he made when he was in Idaho.

For instance, when Frank announced his candidacy for the Presidency in 1976, he did not do it amidst the hoopla and clamor of a Washington press conference. Instead, he chose to do it in Idaho City—a small mining town of less than 200 people today, about an hour's drive from Boise. He made his formal announcement standing on a wooden sidewalk, in front of the old Idaho City Courthouse.

His choice of setting was no accident. For it was on that same sidewalk that his father-in-law, Chase Clark, announced in 1941 that he would be a candidate for the Governorship of Idaho. Chase Clark won that election, and he served as chief executive of the State for the next 4 years.

Frank had battled cancer before this last bout. It was back when he was in college, and his doctors told him he then only had 6 months to live. But Frank was not daunted by that bout or by that doctor's verdict. He rallied back and went on to hold one of the most noted careers of public service in Idaho's history. When I spoke with him following his recent surgery, I could not help but think that Frank would hurdle this obstacle the way he hurdled all the others—with determination and with grace.

Mr. President, the impression that Frank left on Idaho and on this body will not soon be forgotten. I know I join with my colleagues in extending my deepest sympathies to Bethine and to Forrest and to Amy and to Chase, and to the entire Church family and to the host of friends he still has.

Mr. President, I think it is fitting that the junior Senator from Idaho is the Presiding Officer of the Senate at this particular moment. Of course, there will be a time later for the expression of eulogies and tributes by other Members of the body. I thank both the majority leader and the minority leader for yielding this time that I might make this statement at this time.

THE CLOTURE MOTION ON THE TAX AMENDMENT

Mr. BYRD addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I hope that there will not be a cloture motion offered with respect to the tax amendment—at least very early on. I have heard that a cloture motion might be introduced today, immediately upon the callup and the offering of the tax amendment. I hope that will not be the case. I certainly want to cooperate in every way that I can to expedite the action of the Senate on the combination of measures that will probably be enacted, at least in considerable part, as one package, even though I do not like to see the budget reform process used in this manner.

I do not say what I am saying in order to be provocative or to be critical of the procedures that may be utilized by the leadership on the other side of the aisle and perhaps in concert with some on this side of the aisle. I merely call attention to the fact that this tax amendment consists of 1,334 pages. It is going to take a little time, I would hope, for Senators and their staffs to study the amendment and prepare amendments to the amendment if they so desire. So, if a cloture motion were to be offered upon the presentation of the amendment—that would be today—it would mean that the vote on cloture would occur on Wednesday of this week.

That is too soon, in my judgment, Mr. President, for cloture to be invoked—and it may fail to be invoked on that day. It would be up to each individual Senator as to how he wished to vote on cloture. He may wish to vote to invoke cloture or otherwise.

Mr. President, I have never, since I have been the minority leader in this body, sought to obstruct for the sake solely of obstructing the majority leadership in the enactment of measures. I do not want to do that. I do not plan to engage in any obstructionist tactics if I can avoid doing so. I simply make the case as best I can for a reasonable time for study and consideration of, and the offering of amendments to the tax amendment.

Senators should feel that they have an adequate opportunity to debate, to study, and to amend the amendment. I hope that the manger of the amendment and the comanager on this side would give an indication prior to the offering of the tax amendment as to what may be his or their plans anent the offering of a cloture motion. Obviously, if one wished to do so, one could object to the dispensing of the reading of the amendment and the Senate would have to stay in session day and night until the reading of the tax amendment is completed.

I do not want to resort to that extreme measure, but it is within the rules. I would guess that the reading of 1,334 pages would require a great number of hours. If there were objection to calling off that reading, the reading would take precedence over anything else. No cloture motion could be offered during the reading to the amendment; a motion to adjourn or recess could not be made.

That would be an extreme step perhaps, but I hope that the managers of this amendment will give consideration to my expression of hope that a cloture motion will not be offered so immediately as I have heard might be the case.

Of course, there are all kinds of rumors always to be heard around here, and sometimes I am tempted to start one myself. But I know the majority leader is a very reasonable man. I know he would like to see this whole package enacted this week, but he has never been one to want to see the rights of the minority—and it could be a minority on his side of the aisle as well—trampled upon in the interest only of getting quick action on a measure. I have reason to believe that the manager of the amendment, Mr. DOLE, and the comanager, Mr. LONG, would likewise be as reasonable. I think that I am voicing a reasonable request, that being that we not rush into the offering of cloture motions at least for a few days, which could be 2 or 3 days, or more depending on the circumstances, I would hope.

If I have time remaining I yield to the distinguished majority leader.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, do I have time remaining?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is no time left for the majority leader and 45 seconds left for the minority leader.

Mr. BAKER. I thank the Chair. I thank the minority leader for yielding.

Mr. President, I have listened with great interest to the statement made by the minority leader, and of course he can do what he says. Let me say it was not my idea in the first place to file cloture, and I am not talking out of school when I point out that that suggestion was made by the distinguished ranking minority member of the committee, Senator LONG. If I recall correctly, it was first brought up in the minority leader's office. I do not care; at some point the leadership on this side would be disposed to file cloture if the matter gets out of hand or if there are other good reasons to do that. But as far as I am concerned, that is a matter between Senator DOLE and Senator LONG and the leadership. If they want to file cloture today, I suppose I would consider that with the managers. And if they do not, I will be perfectly agreeable.

But I just wanted to make the point it is not part of the leadership strategy on this side to do that. That suggestion came from the other side of the aisle and specifically from Senator LONG. I believe Senator LONG was joined in that by Senator DOLE. I believe their purpose was not to limit debate but to invoke germaneness. I believe also that that has been done in other tax packages in the past. But once again may I say to my friend, the minority leader, that is not part of my strategy and I have no intention of doing that unless and until the two managers come to me and insist on it. So I urge that Senator DOLE and Senator LONG may consult with the minority leader and with me if they choose on how they wish to proceed further. But I wanted to make it clear for this Record that that was not a part of the strategy, and I am prepared to take whatever reasonable time we need in order to deal with this measure.

I would note parenthetically that the tax bill came out of the Finance Committee by a vote of 20 to nothing, and I expect that Senator DOLE and Senator LONG problably can agree on a strategy that they wish to follow.

I am sure the minority leader understands why I say that, but I did not want the Record to reflect any innuendo or suggestion, as I am sure the minority leader did not intend, that the majority or the majority leader is trying to gag anybody on this measure. That was not my suggestion. That is not part of my plan. My intention is to do within reason what the two managers suggest we should do.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for 1 minute.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I hope I did not leave the implication, I would certainly not want to have left the implication, that the majority leader plans or has planned, or that I have heard that he plans, to offer a cloture motion. If I left that implication, I want the Record to also show from my side of the aisle that that was not intended. I have not heard that. I talked to the majority leader earlier this morning on the telephone and indicated my concern about such a possibility, but I have not thought that the majority leader was going to act in that manner. I had heard, however, that the managers planned to offer a cloture motion today. My remarks were intended not to be critical of any Senator, whether he be a manager of the amendment or otherwise, but to express the concern on this side that I have heard that a cloture motion would be offered today upon the presentation of the amendment. I have not had an opportunity to discuss that with the Senator from Kansas or the Senator from Louisiana. I simply hope that I will have the opportunity, before the amendment is offered, to know whether or not there is a plan to offer a cloture motion today.

Mr. BAKER. I thank the minority leader, and I can assure him as I develop more on this I will share it with him.

RECOGNITION OF SENATOR KASTEN

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I see that the Senator claiming the first special order is on the floor, and he appears anxious to proceed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Senator from Wisconsin (Mr. KASTEN) is recognized for not to exceed 15 minutes.

VOTING PRACTICES IN THE UNITED NATIONS—CHEMICAL WEAPONS

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, this is my fifth speech on the voting practices of the United Nations, and today's subject is the U.N. General Assembly's record on the issue of chemical warfare.

It is interesting to note that President Reagan announced just 5 days ago that Vice President BUSH would travel to Geneva this month to submit to the United Nations Committee on Disarmament the draft of a proposed treaty to put into effect a comprehensive, verifiable worldwide ban on chemical weapons. President Reagan said the American initiative would prohibit the production, possession, and use of chemical weapons. And he noted: "The shortcomings of earlier chemical weapons treaties have been made tragically clear in recent years."

Now I would like to address the issue of chemical warfare in the U.N. General Assembly. In 1982 an overwhelming majority of the Assembly showed its concern with the matter by adopting a resolution requesting the U.N. Secretary General to make ready a list of experts and laboratories qualified to respond reliably and impartially on short notice whenever a U.N. member state should request an investigation of suspected use of illegal chemical weapons.

This resolution was entitled "Provisional Procedure To Uphold the Authority of the 1925 Geneva Protocol." The 1925 protocol banned the use in war of chemical and bacteriological weapons in an attempt to prevent repetition of the horror of gas warfare as practiced during the First World War.

That 1982 resolution was approved by an overwhelming vote of 86 in favor to 19 opposed, with 33 abstentions. Interestingly, all the "Noes" were from the Soviet bloc or its supporters such as Syria, Libya, and Congo (Brazzaville). Abstentions included Mexico, Argentina, Bolivia, Brazil, Panama, and Venezuela.

It was in large part thanks to the 1982 General Assembly resolution's mandate and the mechanisms the Secretary General prepared in accord with it that U.N. experts were able to respond as rapidly as they did to the gruesome practices of the Iran-Iraq war.

Just last week, we read reports of the return of a team of U.N. investigators from Iran where they had found, in a battlefield in the south of the country, samples of tabun, a form of nerve gas, a chemical weapon allegedly used illegally by Iraq in its ongoing war with Iran.

This form of nerve gas is estimated to be 10 times more lethal than mustard gas. The State Department believes, as I understand it, that the reports of Iraqi use of mustard gas and nerve gas are credible. Accordingly, the United States joined other U.N. Security Council Members in issuing a consensus statement condemning the use of chemical weapons.

It is noteworthy that in other instances of illegal chemical weapons use, most notably the use of lethal agents against helpless civilians and resistance fighters in Afghanistan, Laos, and Cambodia by the Soviet Union and Vietnam, the international community has not made haste to issue condemnations.

In the recent case of chemical warfare in the Iran-Iraq war, the Iranian authorities allowed the U.N. experts to examine the battleground on Iranian soil where the chemical weapons had been used. The Iranians also allowed the U.S. team to examine chemical war victims or their corpses in morgues and hospitals. It was, of course, in the Iranian interest to permit this investigation.

But U.N. experts have met no such cooperation in their efforts to investigate charges of use of illegal chemical weapons by the Soviet Army against helpless civilians and resistance fighters in Afghanistan, nor has there been any cooperation concerning the use of illegal chemical weapons by the Vietnamese Army against resistance fighters in Cambodia and against innocent hill tribe villagers in Laos. The team of experts organized by the U.N. Secretary General repeatedly has sought and repeatedly has been denied access to each of the Communist-controlled countries. While prevented from conducting on-site investigations in these three countries, the U.N. experts team reported in 1982 that "it could not disregard the circumstantial evidence suggestive of the possible use of some sort of toxic chemical substance in some instances."

Soviet and Vietnamese intransigence has not prevented conclusive investigation. "Yellow rain" toxin samples and specimens of blood, urine, and tissue from victims have reached the outside world from Afghanistan, Cambodia, and Laos. U.S. Government laboratories, Canadian Government laboratories, and the research facilities of independent universities in the United States, Canada, and Thailand have found evidence in these samples of toxic chemicals not naturally present in Laos, Cambodia, or Afghanistan. According to Secretary of State Shultz, "a common factor in the evidence is Soviet involvement in the use of these weapons in all three countries."

Mr. President, Soviet-made chemical weapons are responsible for the deaths of at least 10,000 persons in Southeast Asia and Afghanistan. Many of these have been women and children. It is no wonder that the Soviets and their Vietnamese allies have not allowed international investigators access to the battlegrounds. It should come as no surprise, either, that the Soviets have opposed the impartial investigatory mandate given by the U.N. General Assembly and the mechanisms of implementation established by the Secretary General.

Last year the U.N. General Assembly reaffirmed its resolution of the previous year and asked the Secretary General to continue to pursue "the task entrusted to him" toward systematizing the definitive investigation of charges of chemical weapons use. This resolution was among the 10 "key votes" highlighted in the Department of State's report to Congress on voting practices in the United Nations.

The resolution passed by a large majority. It named no names, employed neutral, if morally clear language, and should have been utterly unobjectionable to any civilized, innocent party. Nevertheless, the Soviets, their puppets and their fellow travelers voted "No." This time there were 20 instead of 19 "Noes." The added vote came from India.

While 97 U.N. members—including the vast majority of the democracies—voted in favor of the 1983 resolution on chemical weapons, it was disturbing again to find some of our Western Hemisphere neighbors, such as Mexico, Brazil, Argentina, and Panama among the small number casting abstentions. I should hope that our hemispheric neighbors would be mindful that the scourge of illegal chemical warfare is not simply an element of an "East-West" conflict from which they may choose to disassociate themselves. Indeed, the evidence is quite clear that chemical warfare is especially a scourge to the Third World. It is plain that lethal chemicals are the weapons preferred by the Soviets in putting down resistance to Communist tyranny in Afghanistan, Laos, and Cambodia.

Needless to say, illegal chemical weapons use is an issue of great importance. It is not a complex issue. Since 1925 the international community has been in agreement on restraining the use of chemical warfare. Those restraints have been observed until recently. Now, 60 years after the signing of the first international instrument against the use of chemical weapons in warfare, we must insure that those restraints not become unravelled.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a table showing those countries which voted against the U.S. position on this issue and are scheduled to receive U.S. foreign assistance in fiscal year 1985 be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks. This list also includes those countries which abstained. This table, in addition to showing the fiscal year 1985 proposed foreign assistance levels, also shows the current year levels and the historic levels of assistance from 1946 through the fiscal year 1985 proposal.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CHEMICAL AND BACTERIOLOGICAL WEAPONS—NATIONS VOTING AGAINST THE RESOLUTION

[Dollars in millions]

	Fiscal year 1985	Fiscal year 1984	1946–1985
Congo	1.1	3.0	21.3

RECOGNITION OF SENATOR PROXMIRE

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the senior Senator from Wisconsin (Mr. PROXMIRE) is recognized for not to exceed 15 minutes.

CAN CITIZENS MAKE A DIFFERENCE IN FORMULATING NUCLEAR ARMS POLICY?

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, the most striking contradiction in this democracy is the shocking difference between the overwhelming public support for our country negotiating a comprehensive halt to the nuclear arms race and the flat determination of our President against even trying to do it. What can American citizens do about this massive contradiction? After all, the threat of nuclear war makes every other issue pale into insignificance. In a nuclear war our country would lose everything. Half of our people would die. Most would die the most agonizing kind of death from burns without any prospect of medical care. Hospitals would be demolished in the first few minutes of a nuclear war. Most doctors would promptly perish with most of the rest of the urban population.

Almost all remaining Americans would starve or freeze to death in the nuclear winter that would envelop the planet following a nuclear war. Certainly there is no price we should pay that would be too high to avoid such a catastrophe. Other issues: The deficit, unemployment, inflation, civil rights, education, abortion, school prayer, crime—all these are critical issues to the people we represent and to the kind of country in which we live, but they cannot hold a candle to the importance of preventing nuclear war.

So why is it that on this—the one big issue—nuclear weapons policy, the people have emphatically taken one position and the Government has taken a directly contrary position? Over and over again the people have voted in statewide referendums for this country negotiating a mutual comprehensive verifiable freeze on nuclear weapons with the Soviet Union. In eight out of nine States such a referendum has carried. The most valid, scientific, professional polls show popular support for such negotiations approved by a smashing 75 percent, that is a 3-to-1 margin.

And yet the administration has turned its back on negotiating anything like a freeze on nuclear weapons with the Soviet Union. Has the administration turned its back? Consider: At the very heart of such negotiations is a comprehensive test ban treaty. Such talks with the Soviet Union and Great Britain were initiated in 1977. They were adjourned indefinitely in 1980. The Reagan administration has not sought their resumption. These talks showed very encouraging signs of movement in Soviet attitude toward cooperative verification. The Soviets accepted the American proposal to install 10 black boxes in Soviet territory. They began to negotiate on detailed procedures for actual conduct of onsite inspections.

But the administration has walked away from this golden opportunity that would have brought the superpowers right to the heart of the nuclear arms race. Those negotiations could have shut off the nuclear arms test. Without those tests progress in advancing nuclear arms technology would stop. Should that progress stop? That progress is precisely what according to New York Times nuclear arms expert Leslie Gelb, could destroy the nuclear deterrence which represents the prime protection that has prevented nuclear war for the past 35 years.

So what can citizens do? How can they stop the nuclear arms race? The answer, Mr. President, was coined by a remarkable Pennsylvania Insurance Commissioner named Herbert Denenberg. Denenberg's advice constitutes six words that I have framed and hung on my office wall. Citizens who want to stop nuclear war should follow this Denenberg advice. Here it is: "Get informed. Get Organized. Get Tough." As one who has been in Congress for more than 26 years, I am sure that if enough citizens apply the Denenberg advice to the nuclear arms race, they will win.

This is not easy but American citizens can do it. They are beginning to do it now. First, they are getting informed. Information on the nuclear arms race is complex. There is lots of it. It involves not only the technical, scientific jargon but making an agreement with a mysterious, distant, hostile Communist dictatorship—the Soviet Union.

Most Americans would not touch that kind of agreement with a 10-foot pole, except that most Americans are practical. They know that the Soviet Union has the same kind of utterly devastating nuclear power. They know that the two adversaries have no choice except to reach an agreement stopping the arms race or perish.

Are Americans who want to stop the nuclear arms race following the second part of the Denenberg prescription? Are they getting organized?

Citizens who favor the nuclear freeze have successfully organized not only election winning referendums but study groups and discussion groups in every section of the country. And they are organizing where it counts most. They want the President of the United States on their side. If the President opposes a nuclear freeze, it has no chance. If he favors it, he can negotiate it.

It is now clear whoever the Democrats nominate for the Presidency this year will favor a nuclear freeze. The Democratic candidate will try hard to make nuclear freeze negotiations the centerpiece of his campaign. Now, Mr. President, there is no doubt that opposition to nuclear war and the determination to end the nuclear arms race is a nonpartisan issue. I have found that Republicans feel as fervently in favor of ending the nuclear arms race as Democrats.

But the central fact of the oncoming Presidential campaign is that the Republican nominee will oppose negotiating a comprehensive end to nuclear arms testing, production, and deployment. The Democratic candidate will favor such negotiations. In the judgment of this Senator this should be and will be the heart of the Presidential campaign. And in view of President Reagan's immense personal popularity, to win election of a President committed to ending the nuclear arms race will take the very best efforts to those who have become convinced that stopping a nuclear war must be the dominant issue of the coming Presidential campaign.

NATIONAL INSTITUTE OF DENTAL RESEARCH WINS APRIL GOLDEN FLEECE

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I am awarding my Golden Fleece of the Month Award for April to the National Institute of Dental Research for sponsoring a 5-year, $465,000 study to find out—brace yourself—the "effects of orthodontia on psychosocial functioning." The Institute spent this money even though the Federal Government does not pay for orthodontia and has no intention of ever doing so. Given the sponsors of this study, perhaps I should have given them a "Golden Floss" award.

The average taxpayer looks forward to April 15 with the same enjoyment he feels about an appointment with the dentist. Paying for a "dad gummed" study like this will be another grinding experience for that taxpayer.

The Institute sponsored this study to examine the effects of orthodontia on the "psychosocial functioning" of 88 young people. The study will do so by using a "battery of psychosocial instruments, including measures of dentofacial attractiveness, self-perception of occlusion, self-image, social behavior, and parents' perception of their children's occlusion * * *" This study will cost the taxpayer over $5,000 for every young person tested.

What is wrong with the Federal Government paying for such a study? Here are two good reasons.

First, the grant award justifies the study by saying, "Since approximately 70 percent of the general population has some form of dentofacial malrelations, the potential demand for treatment based on projected psychosocial benefits is great." But starting a new Government program to assist roughly 160 million people would cost hundreds of billions of dollars. The Department is evidently aware of the potential cost. They said, in response to my question, that they do "not pay for orthodontic treatment for esthetic or functional reasons, nor do we anticipate requesting funds for that kind of treatment."

Why then this study? With medicare in danger of going broke, surely the Department has a better use for the taxpayers' money. I believe the Institute will have a difficult time brushing off this question. The bureaucrats who bought that justification must have had their wisdom teeth pulled.

Second, orthodontists will gather the most benefits from this study and any parent who has coughed up their fee will testify that orthodontists do not work cheap. But when a parent wonders about spending $3,000 to have this kids' teeth straightened, the orthodontist will be able to mention an official U.S. Government study which will no doubt discover that teenagers with good teeth are more attractive to the opposite sex, make better grades, and have more respect for their parents. What parent, what teenager will be able to resist such a blandishment. But such a sales pitch should be paid for by the orthodontists not by the taxpayer.

This administration came into office determined to fight waste, fraud, and abuse. Instead, they seem to have become toothless wonders, all bark and no bite. They deserve no plaque for efficiency this month.

LET US CLOSE THE GAP

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, today I report yet another bitter incident of religious persecution in our world. Christians in Ethiopia have experienced a continuing series of unjust abuse and oppression. The following are but a few examples of inexplicable transgressions on the rights of humans in Ethiopia.

In the province of Wellega, two evangelists of the Lutheran church have been in jail for the past 6 years.

The president of the synod and his secretary were arrested 10 months ago. Every pastor's arrest is followed by the closing of his church.

Three Pentecostal churches in Addis Ababa have been closed down. The buildings have been confiscated.

Five elders of the Mennonite church in Addis Ababa have been in jail for the past 2 years.

Mr. Tumsa, the general secretary of the Lutheran church, who was imprisoned 4 years ago, is now missing.

Reverend Shamsudin, general secretary of the Ethiopian National Council of Churches, Reverends Haile Kyrios and Negastie, have all been in jail for the past 2 years.

The Lutheran pastors Olana and Maigarsa have been imprisoned for the past 10 months. Two other pastors, Tesfaya and Desta, remain in prison after 7 years.

Bishop Theophilus of the Orthodox church has not been heard of since his arrest 9 years ago.

Mr. President, it is obvious that the Christian community suffers here. The United States, a country of free people committed to the principles of democracy, always has and will continue to speak out against such persecution. We consistently stand behind and support groups who have been victims of discrimination, oppression, and violence.

Yet this country's fine human rights record is not without a gap. Quite a sizable gap. The United States for 35 years has refused to ratify the Genocide Convention.

Genocide is an international crime which must be prevented and punished. Ratification of the Genocide Convention would strengthen the U.S. protests against worldwide pain and suffering such as that endured by Christians in Ethiopia.

Without our consent and advice, the Genocide Convention ironically lacks the world's No. 1 human rights advocate. We must fill in this gap. We must ratify the Genocide Convention.

WHAT ARE THE ECONOMIC CONSEQUENCES OF SHARP REDUCTIONS IN THE FEDERAL DEFICIT?

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, as I understand it, today we will begin discussing the reconciliation and the budget, so I wish to speak briefly on that subject.

To achieve a balanced budget in 1985, that is the coming year, should Congress make the spending cuts and revenue increases necessary to achieve it? I wish I could say yes, but, unfortunately, Mr. President, the answer is no, an emphatic, sure, "No." That may seem shocking to many who, like this Senator, have been loudly pleading for responsibility in fiscal policy. Why not balance the budget next year? Why not cut spending, all spending, to the bone? And then after we cut spending as much as possible, why not summon up the courage to raise taxes to whatever level is necessary to bring the budget into balance?

And why not do it now—not 5 or 10 years from now—but now? It is easy for us to talk about what Congress should accomplish 10 years from now. Most of us now in Congress will not be here 10 years from now. Even if we are here, what we pledge today will be long forgotten 10 years from now. And there is no way today's Congress can control what a Congress elected 10 years from now decides to do or, for that matter, can control what a Congress elected this year will do next year. Our responsibility today is to pass on the 1985 budget. A new Congress and maybe a new President will determine the budget in 1986, 1987, and later years. This Congress will determine that 1985 budget in its final form within the next few months. Does not virtually every respected economic authority tell us that the deficit is scandalously irresponsible, that it will drive interest rates through the roof?

Indeed, interest rates are already starting to climb. Those massive deficits will eventually skyrocket prices once again. Respected economic experts tell us that rising inflation and rising interest rates will choke off the recovery and plunge the country into another recession, even deeper than the 1982 recession. So why not simply opt for the deepest reduction in the deficit and if in coming weeks no one offers an amendment that would wipe out the entire 1985 deficit for the coming year, why not amend whatever is offered to bring the budget into balance this year, not 5 or 10 years from now, but this year?

Why not? The answer is that this kind of sudden cold turkey treatment may work for a person cutting out smoking. It will not work in jarring our economy back into a healthy condition for two reasons. First, no matter how sharply Congress may reduce Federal spending, and no matter how steeply the Congress increases Federal tax rates, we cannot guarantee that we will bring the budget into balance. The Federal Government has become such a big force in the economy that its fiscal policy now plays the major role in determining the economy's direction. Too few observers have recognized that the present strong recovery, with unemployment falling a record 4 million in the past 15 months, has not just coincided with the two biggest back-to-back deficits in the Nation's history. The recovery has been the product of those deficits. The deficits are precisely the force that put 4 million Americans back to work.

So what happens when the Congress reduces those deficits? What happens when we cut military spending by $30 or $40 billion? Answer: We lose from 750,000 to 1 million jobs. What happens when we make similar reductions in roadbuilding, bridge building, water projects, local projects paid for by revenue sharing; what happens when we slash $30 or $40 billion out of domestic spending? The same thing happens. The country loses 750,000 to 1 million jobs.

What happens when we increase Federal tax revenues by $100 billion or so in a single year? We take that money out of the pockets of American families so they have less to spend and less to invest. Result: We lose about 2½ million jobs. And what happens when 3 or 4 million Americans lose their jobs because of the combined effort of what I have just been talking about? Two things happen: First, Federal spending goes up by tens of billions of dollars. It goes up for unemployment compensation and an endless variety of welfare programs. Second, Federal revenues go down. They go down as the income of millions of Americans fall, and as millions of others find their income, with their jobs, completely gone. So, of course, they pay less—tens of billions of dollars less—in taxes. So this cold turkey, balance-the-budget-now treatment will not work; first, because the drastic treatment shrivels the economy. Second, it will not work because tax increases and, to an even greater extent, spending reductions take several years to develop their greatest effect.

Military spending is a prime example. The military spending that, in the judgment of many of us, should bear the most of the military cuts is military procurement. But military procurement is precisely the kind of spending that will reflect reductions made in 1984, primarily in 1987, 1988, and later.

For example, if we reduce spending for the MX in 1984, it will save little in the 1985 budget, but it will save $20 billion in the next few years. If we completely eliminate spending for the so-called star wars research, it will only save $2 billion in 1985. It would save $25 billion over the next 5 years, however.

Of course, there are some exceptions. But, for most programs, both domestic and military, spending reductions are far more efficient and less wasteful if projected over several years.

Mr. President, the prime point is that the Congress should spend whatever it takes to meet the responsibilities of our Federal Government, and no more. The Congress should have the courage to raise what it requires to pay for meeting those responsibilities. But when the Congress finds itself, as it does today, with a $200 billion deficit and the certainty of deficits of that order for many years to come unless fiscal policies are changed and changed drastically, it must modify its fiscal policy with full awareness of the effect of its change on general economic conditions.

That means the Congress should follow a policy of firm and consistent gradualism. Does that mean Congress should shun a sharp cut in the deficit in 1985? No, indeed. Congress should recognize that a deficit in 1985 of $120 billion, if unemployment is at the projected level of 7 percent, is about the same in relation to a full employment economy as a deficit of $195 billion in 1983 with unemployment averaging nearly 10 percent.

This means that genuine movement toward a sound fiscal policy would require that Congress not aim to balance the budget cold turkey in 1985, but plan for a major reduction in the deficit in the order of about $75 billion, not the $160 to $170 billion which the President and the Democratic majority are suggesting.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, there will now be a period for the transaction of routine morning business for not to extend beyond the hour of 1 p.m., with statements therein limited to 5 minutes each.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KASTEN). Without objection, it is so ordered.

THE DEATH OF FORMER SENATOR FRANK CHURCH

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, our Senate is the better for the service of Frank Church. His keen mind and his understanding heart were the hallmark of his Senate career of 24 years.

We shall not forget Frank's substantial leadership in a broad-based commitment to crucial issues. His creative thought and bold action had a positive impact on Capitol Hill, on his State of Idaho, on our Republic, and on our shrinking world where time and distance are no more. He could joke and smile. Yet, his eyes at times held back a tear. His concerns were varied, but he was not afraid to face the fight or toil with willing hands. He used his strength to do what he believed to be necessary, and he had the will to dare.

Bethine, his childhood sweetheart, who became his companion and wife, and their sons Forrest and Chase, are remembered by us.

SENATOR FRANK CHURCH

Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, it may have been as much as 10 years ago that I was walking with Frank Church across the lawn of the Capitol on a bright spring day such as those that we look forward to enjoying in the weeks ahead, and as we walked along through the spring sunshine of Washington, he said to me, "How many of those Members of the Senate who are serving today will be remembered 10 years after they have left?"

I said, "I am not sure, Frank. Who do you think will be remembered 10 years after he leaves the Senate?"

Well, he said, Bill Fulbright and some others. With his customary modesty and sense of decency, he gave no suspicion that Frank Church himself would be on his own list.

Here we are, about 10 years after that conversation, and I think Frank Church should be on the list of those Members of the Senate who will be remembered. I think particularly of some of the experiences that I shared with him. His leadership of the committee that looked into the intelligence agency of the United States brought that agency into a partnership with the Congress. We all know that in modern government, it is absolutely essential to have the ability to acquire information about what is going on in the world. But for too long, that agency operated without close liaison with the Congress. As a result of Frank Church's efforts, the intelligence community was brought into partnership with the Congress, and the intelligence committees of the Congress were established. I think that is a contribution that will be remembered for far more than 10 years.

Then I think of the committee that Frank Church and I cochaired, a rather unusual arrangement which was made possible by the leadership of the Congress but particularly because Frank Church was willing to share the chairmanship of the committee with a member of the minority party at that time. That was the committee that dealt with the termination of the state of national emergency in which the country had existed ever since the declaration of national emergency by President Roosevelt during the Great Depression. As a result of the work of that committee, we found there were in fact some 450 statutes under which a President could declare an emergency and exercise extraordinary powers independent of the legislative branch. It was an unsatisfactory state of the law. That is a state of the law that was an opportunity for abuse, and as a result of Frank Church's leadership and effort, we enacted the necessary legislative remedies which prevented, I think, the continued abuse of power and more importantly prevented the serious constitutional crisis that might have come upon us in the future had this situation not been corrected.

So in tribute to Frank Church, I should like to extend his own list of those Members of the Senate who will be remembered after they have left here and add the name of Frank Church. Mrs. Mathias joins me in expressing our sympathy and sorrow to Mrs. Church and the members of their family.

THE DEATH OF FORMER SENATOR FRANK CHURCH

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, it is with the deepest sadness and regret that I know of the death of my dear friend, Senator Frank Church. Frank Church was an immensely highly principled, compassionate, and intelligent man. He served his beloved State of Idaho with distinction. His kindness and concern were unsurpassed not only for all those with whom he worked or who were lucky enough to be his friends, but also for the millions of Americans who he believed it was his duty and privilege to speak for as U.S. Senator.

He exemplified to me the qualities of a great Senator. He spoke well, thought deeply, and had a heart as big as his mind. His legislative record was superlative. He was the author of the Cooper-Church amendment, which placed the first limits on the expansion of the war into Cambodia and Laos, and floor manager in successful consideration of the Panama Canal treaties. His record also included legislation to protect the environment, foster civil rights, and protect the elderly.

But those of us who knew Frank well were well aware that his abiding interest and commitment was first and foremost in matters concerning the conduct of American foreign policy. It was in this area, in particular, that Senator Church dared to challenge the prevailing wisdom of his time. He was one of the first Senators to speak out against increasing American involvement in Vietnam. In a particularly insightful comment, he observed that "No nation, not even our own, possesses an arsenal so large or a treasury so rich as to damp down the fires of smoldering revolution throughout the whole awakening world."

His interest in foreign policy did not cease after leaving the Senate. Only 3 weeks ago in the Washington Post, Frank wrote about the current disastrous state of our policy with respect to Central America. In "We Must Learn to Live with Revolutions," he noted that the foment in Central America is driven largely by nationalist forces, not Communist or even capitalist. He cautioned that our failure to accept those forces of change in Nicaragua and El Salvador would lead to yet another blow to U.S. prestige in the international community. In fact, he warned that "by making the outcome of this internal struggle a national security issue for the United States, as the Kissinger Commission does, we virtually guarantee an American military intervention wherever the tide turns in favor of the insurgents."

His speech at the Democratic Convention of 1976 was truly a remarkable one—better than any speech given at the convention—and brought us all to our feet with applause.

I am particularly sad at his death as we were friends before either of us were Senators, and I had the good fortune to be chairman of the first Church for President campaign committee in 1975.

His death is a dreadful blow. All we can ask is that his gallant wife, Bethine, bear up as best she can because, if ever there was a marriage or a family that combined partnership, love, and humor, it was theirs. My wife Nuala and I extend our deepest sympathy and love to Bethine and their sons, Forrest and Chase.

THE DEATH OF FORMER SENATOR FRANK CHURCH

Mr. SYMMS. Mr. President, earlier today I was presiding over the Senate when my senior colleague, Senator McCLURE, announced formally to the Senate, and made the very fitting eulogy to my predecessor in this office. Mr. President, I want to join my colleagues in the Senate expressing sorrow on the death of Frank Church, my predecessor, who represented the State of Idaho in the Senate for 24 years, from 1947 to 1981. His widow, Bethine Church, and other members of the family have my deepest sympathy.

Frank and I had our disagreements, but it was impossible not to admire his courage in standing steadfast by his beliefs. His rise was a tribute to his talent and to the State that produced him. And although he became well known for his service as chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee and for his interest in world affairs, he began the delegation tradition of prompt, informative replies to constituents and always put them top on his list of priorities, staying in touch and keeping in touch. He will be remembered by Idahoans for a long time to come.

Yesterday, Mr. President, the Washington Post published a fine obituary of Frank Church by Richard Pearson.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the article be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FRANK CHURCH DIES; WAS IDAHO SENATOR

(By Richard Pearson)

Frank Church, an eloquent and independent voice in the Senate for nearly a quarter of a century who called for compassion at home and courageous common sense abroad, died of cancer yesterday at his home in Bethesda. He was 59.

He represented Idaho as a Democrat in the Senate for 24 years before leaving office in January 1981 following his defeat by Republican Steven D. Symms.

Sen. Church was chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee during his last two years in the Senate.

Sen. Church probably became best known as a longtime critic of American policy in Southeast Asia. He began speaking against the Vietnam War in 1963, long before it was fashionable in conservative states such as Idaho, or even among liberal Democrats.

He said that the war was not aggression by proxy from China or Moscow but an indigenous revolution, led by a man—Ho Chi Minh—who appeared to be the only true Vietnamese leader on the scene. He also had said that in fighting the war, this nation's executive branch was exercising war-making powers that belong to Congress.

In 1970, Sen. Church co-authored with Sen. John Sherman Cooper (R-Ky.) the Cooper-Church amendment that placed the first limits on expansion of the war into Cambodia and Laos, by exerting congressional authority over the purse-strings.

After American troops were withdrawn from Vietnam, he co-authored with Sen. Clifford Case (R-N.J.) the Case-Church amendment that put an end to American bombing in Cambodia by cutting off further funds.

He left his mark on legislation that included civil rights, the environment and cost-of-living payments for the elderly.

But in the 1970s, Sen. Church's name became synonymous with several of the Senate's most far-reaching investigations, which he directed. One, by the Subcommittee on Multinational Corporations, revealed that the International Telephone & Telegraph Corp. and the CIA had discussed the possibility of financing covert effort to prevent the 1970 election of Chilean President Salvador Allende.

That subcommittee also exposed bribery of foreign officials by major U.S. corporations and an Arab blacklist of Jewish and reputedly pro-Israel businesses.

That assignment was followed in 1975 by appointment to head the Select Committee to Study Governmental Operations With Respect to Intelligence Activities, set up to investigate abuses of power by the Central Intelligence Agency and the Federal Bureau of Investigations.

The select committee disclosed that the CIA had developed toxins for military use, had plotted the assassinations of foreign heads of government, and illegally spied on Americans, and that the FBI had harassed various dissident groups and staged illegal break-ins of homes and offices. Its findings led to the creation of a permanent committee to oversee the FBI and CIA.

But the term of the select committee, originally nine months, grew to 15, and caused a fatal delay in Sen. Church's bid for the Democratic presidential nomination in 1976. He won four primaries, but withdrew from the race and endorsed Jimmy Carter.

His years as Foreign Relations chairman were less successful. Although he had helped guide the Panama Canal Treaty through the Senate, he was unable to gain ratification for a strategic arms pact negotiated with the Soviet Union by the Carter administration. He personally had opposed ratification for a time when the existence of a Soviet combat brigade in Cuba was revealed.

Over the years, he gained the approval of Idaho's voters as an unyielding champion of water interests vital to agriculture. Although he voted for much of the liberal agenda of the Johnson administration, he departed from that fold at crucial times. He was against abortion and was a leading voice against gun control.

He also was chairman of the Senate Committee on Aging for eight years and had been an early advocate of financial disclosure. In 1964, he began making public his income and assets, and he sponsored a 1973 amendment that required such disclosures during congressional campaigns.

When Congress learned earlier this year that Sen. Church had cancer, it approved a bill naming 2.2 million acres of Idaho wilderness in his honor. The area is called The Frank Church River of No Return.

Upon learning of his death, President Reagan said Sen. Church "served his nation with distinction and dedication. His abiding interest in foreign policy made an important intellectual contribution to our nation."

Frank Forrester Church was born July 25, 1924, in Boise, Idaho, to Frank Forrester Church 2nd and Laura Bilderback Church. His father's occupation was owner of a sporting goods store and his hobby was politics. A strong believer in the conservative branch of the Republican Party, he detested the domestic policies of President Franklin D. Roosevelt.

To stimulate debate at the dinner table and to further the future senator's education, the elder Church encouraged his son to study history and politics at the library. This enabled the younger Church to argue the "Democratic" side in debates with his father.

Perhaps those debates led to Sen. Church's victory in 1941 in the American Legion's national oratory contest. He won a scholarship that took him to Stanford University. However, it also changed his life in another way. Sen. Church later recalled to a reporter, "I decided, much to Dad's consternation, that he belonged to the wrong party."

He interrupted his studies at Stanford in 1942 to become an Army intelligence officer in the China-India-Burma theater, but returned to the university after the war and earned a bachelor's degree in 1947.

He entered Harvard Law School, but transferred to Stanford's law school in hopes that the warm California weather would ease the chronic pain he had developed in his lower back.

Instead doctors diagnosed incurable cancer of the abdomen and lumph nodes and predicted death within six months. His weight plunged to 80 pounds. Another doctor disagreed with the terminal diagnosis and prescribed X-ray treatments that led to Church's recovery. He earned his law degree with his class in 1950.

On June 21, 1947, he married his high school sweetheart, Jean Bethine Clark. Her father was Chase A. Clark, a Democrat who was Idaho's governor in 1941 and 1942 and later was a U.S. District Court judge. In 1956, Sen. Church was a lawyer whose only try for elective office, to the state legislature four years earlier, had ended in defeat.

Yet his father-in-law, and others, believed he had a chance to capture a seat in the U.S. Senate. Sen. Church first ran against Glen Taylor, a former senator who had run for vice president on Henry Wallace's Progressive Party ticket in 1948. He beat Taylor by 170 votes. In the 1956 general election he faced incumbent Sen. Herman Welker, a McCarthyite. Sen. Church won a fairly easy victory.

Upon arriving in Washington, he became a protege of then Senate Majority Leader Lyndon B. Johnson. After helping Johnson on several crucial votes, including sponsorship of key civil rights legislation in the 1950s, Johnson helped him gain seats on the old Interior Committee, crucial to a senator from a western state, and on Foreign Relations. At age 36, Sen. Church stepped into the national spotlight as keynote speaker at the 1960 Democratic National Convention.

After Johnson became president and Sen. Church began opposing the war in Vietnam, many believed his Senate days were numbered. But Sen. Church went on winning. In a 1976 interview, his 1964 Republican opponent, Jack Hawley, revealed that he had voted for Sen. Church ever since his own race.

Since 1981, Sen. Church had practiced law in Washington with firm of Whitman & Ransom.

In addition to his wife, of Bethesda, survivors include two sons, Forrest, of New York City, and Chase, of Bethesda, and two grandchildren.

JACKIE PRESSER'S ADDRESS ON UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, straight talk and election-year politics seem to be mutually exclusive. The public has become accustomed to the panoply of election-year rhetoric of the incumbents and challengers and other public figures intricately involved in the electoral process. This rhetoric ranges from blatant misstatements and untruths to the grayer area of overstatements, exaggerations, and misleading statements. Citizens interested in learning about campaign issues often get lost in the charges and countercharges exchanged and, in frustration, tune out the politicians long before election day. This is unfortunate, but the public is understandably frustrated with the confusion created by the random fire of accusations, allegations, and insinuations.

Therefore, it was particularly pleasing for me to come across a speech by Mr. Jackie Presser, general president of the International Brotherhood of Teamsters, the Nation's largest labor union, which provided all of us with some straight talk on a subject too often distorted by cheap political rhetoric: unemployment. His speech spoke of a creative partnership between labor, management, and government as the requisite first step in the walk toward full employment in America. He spoke of abandoning the counterproductive adversarial approach to labor negotiations and employment problem solving, and instead called for cooperation and reconciliation. His speech was a welcome reminder that the public can respond to highroad politics and that our better instincts can be challenged to improve the quality of life in America.

As I said, Mr. Presser's address was a refreshing interlude from the regular conduct of election-year politics, and I ask unanimous consent that the text of his remarks be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the text was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

REMARKS BY JACKIE PRESSER—AMERICA WORKS WHEN AMERICA WORKS

It is certainly an honor and a pleasure to have the opportunity to address such a distinguished audience. The theme of your conference couldn't be more welcome or timely. Far too often, those of us in labor, management and government get caught up in the grind of day-to-day details and risk missing the forest for the trees.

As I have stated repeatedly since becoming General President of the International Brotherhood of Teamsters, it is time to break with the past, time to develop a new American partnership that can lead this nation into a progressive new direction that benefits the individual working man and woman and the economic system as a whole.

The many weighty questions that confront the labor relations community in America—bankruptcies, layoffs, trade deficits, productivity and technological innovation—boil down to the single issue of job security. By job security, I'm talking about more than just the retention and creation of jobs today, I'm talking about the adaptation of business, labor and government to the demands of the future.

Ladies and gentleman, that future is staring us directly in the face and the prospect is not a happy one.

We pat ourselves on the back when only 8.0 percent of the labor force is out of work. We might not be so complacent if we look a bit further. Youth unemployment, a social and cultural timebomb, stands at 20 percent. Among minorities, it is 29 percent. And unemployment among black teenagers is a shameful 50 percent.

The fact is, America is not working.

We can appreciate the magnitude of the challenge that lies before us by a quick glance at the past. My union is a little over 80 years old.

Eighty years ago, nearly half of America's workers were farmers. Today, 4 percent are in farming. Eighty years ago, the steel industry was an infant, and the automobile industry not yet born. Computer technology lay a full two generations in the future.

The transformation of our workforce, the movement of our people and the improvement in their skills and standard of living since then have been staggering. Just imagine the changes in American society an 80 year old man or woman has witnessed in his or her life.

And yet, hard as it may be to comprehend, the changes of the final years of this century will likely surpass those of the last 80. And if that projection doesn't put the fear of God into you, you're either asleep or dead.

It means that all the displacements, all the technological innovations of 80 years will be compressed into 16.

Look at what has happened in just the first three years of this decade:

There are one-third fewer auto workers today than there were in 1980;

For the first time in our history more than one-half of the workforce is female:

Home computer sales have topped $1 billion in sales;

A generation of school children has grown dependent on calculators and video games; and

In business circles, teleconferencing and fully automated offices are no longer novelties.

These changes will only occur more rapidly and on a larger scale in the years ahead. As they do, they will totally reshape the American economy.

The question is * * * can the three major economic institutions—labor, management and government—keep pace with this change in order to improve employment opportunities for the people of this nation?

I don't know the answer to that question, but I do know this—if we don't, America will not have much of a future, and we will have squandered the glorious inheritance our forefathers left to us.

I know one other thing as well—we won't be able to do it unless we end the time-honored adversarial approach to our problems and join together to formulate joint strategies and policies to address the employment crisis.

I have been in the labor movement all my life, and I have witnessed first-hand the evolution of labor-management relations in this country. I well remember the early days of deep distrust and mutual threats. I rose through the labor ranks during the so-called "golden years" when America's postwar economic boom calmed fears and reduced strife. And finally, I have watched in recent years, at first, inflation, and then recession, rekindled the distrust and anger of those early years and threatened to rip the fabric of stable labor-management relations.

We can all take heart in the recent economic upswing, but we should not be blinded to the fact that the real employment crisis has little to do with the recent recession. The problem is structural.

Of course, economic growth, if we can sustain it, will expand employment opportunities. But that will not be enough. We need an employment policy that will make sure that our workers can fill the job openings that that growth will create.

The sad fact of life is that we have millions of laid-off workers whose jobs are likely never to return.

How do you tell the steelworker, the auto worker, the truck driver that the mill, the factory, the truck terminal is closed forever? And how does he tell his son who's always wanted to follow in his father's footsteps?

As a union leader who talks with other union leaders, I see and hear that everyday. The worker, in his frustration, blames his union. We blame management. And management blames the government. And all that finger-pointing accomplishes absolutely nothing.

The solution is not just avoiding recessions. It is not just extending unemployment benefits. It is not just enacting protectionist laws.

We need an employment policy that emphasizes prevention of unemployment rather than one designed merely to soften its impact. We need a plan that not only offers remedies for today, but hope for tomorrow. We need a program that anticipates displacement, not one that reacts to it. And we need to put job security on the same level of priority as national security.

We can't do it with the tools of the past. Unless we develop a mechanism that allows us to adapt to the circumstances facing us and develop a vehicle for adjusting these concerns in a mutually satisfactory manner, we will be condemning ourselves and our children to life in a second-rate nation.

In my opening remarks, I referred to the possibility of a new American partnership between labor, management and government. It is time to make that possibility a reality.

I have proposed the establishment of a tripartite policy-making body that would meet on a regular basis to develop long-range plans for labor relations in America. I am not talking about just another paperwork commission. I'm talking about a committee, comprised of labor, management and government officials, that would have broad authority over employment and training programs.

The need for a new structure is obvious at a time when, just in Congress alone, eight committees must deal with even minor changes in the unemployment insurance law. While they're deciding jurisdiction over problems, the problems have been getting larger.

I genuinely believe that such a tripartite body could get this country moving again. The experiment of labor-management cooperation committees has worked and continues to this day. Why not add the third integral partner in the labor relations system in America and start to get things done on a large scale, as we have on a small scale, in the Job Training Partnership Act of 1982.

I have no doubt that carrying out a comprehensive attack on the employment crisis will be very difficult. But winning the right to collective bargaining in the 30's was no picnic either. At the time that legislation was passed, many forecasters predicted doom for the American economy. Instead, the collective bargaining process brought dignity and hope to the American worker and markets and opportunities to American industry.

It is time for another "labor revolution," one based on courage, cooperation and concern for the future. There's no turning the clock back. We're engaged, and must compete, in a global economy. The industrialization of newly developing countries will continue, as will technological progress.

The important point is that we are all in this together. Unions, management and government must all be concerned with how to make enterprises more effective and efficient, and how to best make use of our manpower.

As the spokesman for the largest trade union in the free world, I welcome that challenge and I urge you to join me in helping to shape a future in which the American family has the opportunity to make tomorrow better than today. Let's remember the words of the wise philosopher who wrote, "the essential things in life are the things we hold in common, not the things we hold separately."

Thank you.

TRIBUTE TO GAR KAGANOWICH

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, Senator WEICKER and I wish to commend Gar Kaganowich, who is leaving the Senate staff this month, for his distinguished career of public service.

As chairman of the Senate Appropriations Committee, I know how important his contributions have been—although often unheralded—in getting the job done, frequently under difficult and demanding conditions.

For the past 10 years, Gar has worked with the Subcommittee on Labor, Health and Human Services, and Education. Considering the long hours required by the enormous workload of that subcommittee, these years of service could alone constitute an entire career—but Gar's working life started many years earlier.

Following graduation from Rutgers University with a bachelor's degree in journalism, and Northwestern University with a master's degree in radio/TV journalism, Gar went on to serve in the Army. In 1955, Gar became a sports reporter and desk man for The Press in Binghamton, NY. But that was not his first job, since I understand that during his high school years, he became a rather accomplished soda jerk. His penchant for working during school continued at college, where Gar was a "stringer" for local newspapers.

In 1956, Gar went to work for United Press International as a newswriter, and later bureau chief, in Newark, NJ. Dedicated to his work, as always, Gar even debated returning early from his honeymoon in Bermuda to cover a train accident in New Jersey. He ended his New Jersey assignment by covering the United Nations, including such memorable events as Khrushchev and Castro visiting New York City. During 1961, he was UPI's New York State news editor in Albany, NY.

In 1962, Gar went to work for the news department of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, and soon thereafter became an executive assistant in the office of Senator Clifford P. Case. It was Senator Case who eventually convinced Gar to move over to the professonal staff of the Appropriations Committee, where he first worked on the minority staff of the Transportation Subcommittee. In succeeding years, after moving to the Labor, Health and Human Services, and Education Subcommittee, Gar served ranking Republican members Norris Cotton, Ed Brooke, and Richard Schweiker.

In 1980, when I became full committee chairman, Gar assumed the onerous task of directing the staff of the Labor-HHS Subcommittee under Senator Harrison Schmitt. With vigor and skill, Gar quickly organized a series of economic overview hearings that established the right tone and momentum for our initial efforts—and continued to build a solid record of accomplishment.

Most notably, Gar has become our resident expert in a variety of health areas, but especially the National Institutes of Health. His grasp of the importance of biomedical research to our Nation will certainly be missed by all on our committee, but especially by Senator WEICKER, who currently chairs the Labor-HHS-Education Subcommittee. His contributions in serving the Nation in these areas are too numerous to list, but certainly as a result of his counsel, the Nation will reap the benefits of his efforts in the years to come.

I know I speak for all the members and staff of the Appropriations Committee when I say how much his contributions will be missed.

Gar, on behalf of everyone that you have served so well, thank you, and best wishes in your future endeavors.

OUR COUNTRY, RIGHT OR WRONG

Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, "Our country, right or wrong" is a famous phrase that is often misquoted and often misapplied. It is that kind of error that must have misled the "senior State Department official" in announcing that the Reagan administration would not accept World Court jurisdiction in disputes involving Central America for the next 2 years.

I am shocked by the decision to rely on the technical rules of court rather than to defend the actions of the United States at the bar of international justice and in the view of the whole world. It smacks of taking advantage of the provisions of the fifth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which is legally permissible, but would not generally be considered to be an admirable course of conduct.

It seems to me that it would be better to defend our policy in Central America and to take the risk that we might lose in a fair judicial proceeding than to give the impression that we have something discreditable to conceal.

The full quotation of the well-known statement by Carl Schurz is: "Our country, right or wrong. When right, to be kept right; when wrong, to be put right." Avoiding a full defense of our position in the World Court is not condoned by Carl Schurz' dictum.

THE BIPARTISAN PITCH FROM THE PRESIDENT

Mr. MELCHER. Mr. President, President Reagan would, in large part, blame Congress for the failure of his foolish decision to station the marines in Lebanon, contrary to the counsel of the Joint Chiefs of Staff and, humbly, against my expressed objections.

The President stridently squawks for bipartisan support for this foreign venture, notwithstanding he is partisan until his bad decision completely and flatly failed.

He is a hard President to communicate with, even when the purpose is a sincere, fundamental desire to help him. Every President needs help. This one in particular.

I have had experience with the President's lack of bipartisan interest in a special circumstance. Having visited the Philippines last December, I consulted in January with National Security Adviser Robert McFarlane to pass on what I believe are pertinent suggestions for cooperation with the Philippines. That country, a significant trading partner and the unique key to our defense posture in Southeast Asia is stymied with a combination of economic distress, a severe dollar shortage, and a muddled political situation following last summer's events of the illness of President Marcos and the assassination of Benigno Aquino.

The worldwide recession affects the Philippines with a lack of markets, a resulting trade imbalance at a time their foreign debt is about $30 billion and the devaluation of their money. The political uncertainty caused by the illness of President Marcos and last year's uncertainty of who would be his successor should he be permanently incapacitated or succumb was greatly aggravated by the Aquino assassination.

Last November the appointment of the Agrava Fact Finding Commission to perform an investigation of that crime independent of the Government and in December the Philippine Parliament's legislation setting the Speaker as successor to the President started to quench the political uncertainty.

While economic problems plague the Philippines with increasing unemployment, Jaime Cardinal Sin, Catholic Relief Services, and the Government of the Philippines joined in a $10 million food aid application to the United States for 100,000 unemployed Filipino families. Pursuant to this food-for-peace request, Cardinal Sin asked me in January to deliver a letter from him to President Reagan.

Considering the long-time alliance of the Philippines with the United States, it was an ordinary request that should have been quickly expedited and fulfilled from the burgeoning U.S. food surplus. Considering the Cardinal Sin is recognized as a critic of the Marcos government but yet had joined with them in presenting the application for badly needed food aid, it would only be natural for the President to promptly arrange to receive the cardinal's letter.

Not so. The President did not so choose. He is a hard man to help in a bipartisan Philippine policy.

Meanwhile, the Agency for International Development (AID) has partially granted approval for one-half of the food aid application. In addition, the Senate has approved—59 to 17—earmarking $5 million for the Philippines an additional food-for-peace appropriation to complete the $10 million food assistance. To that extent, the Senate gave bipartisan support for our alliance with the Filipino people.

But no thanks to the President. He is either too busy or preoccupied with other matters.

Cardinal Sin's letter has still not been received by the President, let alone acknowledged.

BUSH VETS

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, there is an unfortunate treatment of Vietnam era veterans in this country that has been going on for several years. These men and women, from all parts of the country, from varied backgrounds and all walks of life are continually lumped into a single category: troubled.

I noticed this practice again just recently when U.S. News & World Report published an article about "bush vets," Vietnam era veterans who have moved to Alaska to become modern hermits. They live in the wilderness to escape civilization and its pressures. Or so the story goes.

There is no doubt that there are some veterans throughout the country for whom the war produced unbearable anxiety or post-traumatic stress syndrome. There is no doubt that some of these young men and women have moved to the wilderness to withdraw. I am proud to come from a State that still has the wild land, fresh air, and space for those Americans who choose a subsistence way of life.

But there is an important point that has been lost in these "bush vet" stories. These characterizations apply to only a tiny fraction of the Vietnam veterans.

For most veterans of that era, the No. 1 problem is employment. Attempts have been made to assist veterans in finding meaningful jobs through a proliferation of "storefront" vet centers, beefed-up job training programs and a veterans preference in hiring for Federal jobs. But these efforts are diluted when vets are portrayed as "troubled." This characterization may help educate the public about the problems of a few Vietnam veterans. Unfortunately, that same characterization will also hurt many veterans, decreasing their job opportunities because the assertions encompass all vets.

Vietnam era veterans have been alternately ignored, scorned, pitied and misrepresented. All they really want from us is acceptance and a chance to get on with their lives.

MAYOR TOM HALL'S TENURE BRINGS PROGRESS TO MILLINGTON

Mr. SASSER. Mr. President, a dedicated public servant, Tom Hall has been mayor of the city of Millington, TN, for nearly 25 years.

During this period, the city has seen significant growth, and it has enjoyed a strong sense of stability.

Under his leadership, Millington has progressed in a number of key areas.

Mayor Hall played an instrumental role in the annexation into the city of the largest inland naval facility in the world.

The installation doubled the area of the city, and contributes more than $130 million to the local economy each year.

Tom Hall entered office facing a staggering budget deficit, but has managed the city of Millington with a balanced budget for over 8 years.

Millington has recently been recognized as the second largest city in the State of Tennessee operating within a balanced budget.

With his retirement, Mayor Hall will leave office with the city's property tax virtually unchanged since he took office in 1960.

In addition, after many years of struggle, the mayor received approval for the construction of a much needed $12 million waste water treatment facility for the city.

With Mayor Hall's diligent efforts in obtaining Federal funding through the capital improvements program, the plant is scheduled to be completed later this year without the expenditure of city revenues.

In recent years, Mayor Hall has worked tirelessly to bring new industries to Millington in order to build a progressive and diversified city.

A true statesman, Tom Hall's steady leadership and administrative ability have built a strong foundation with which to move the city of Millington forward to new challenges.

I wish Tom a fruitful and happy retirement.

I ask unanimous consent that a recent article from the Millington Star regarding Mayor Hall be included in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Millington, TN, Star, Mar. 21, 1984]

YEARS AS MAYOR PASSED QUICKLY

He was the son of a carpenter, who had carved out a modest living as a Millington businessman in the 1950s.

When he got an itch to run for mayor in 1960 he thought he'd last one term and then settle back into the business world.

That was 24 years ago. Today, Thomas Forrest Hall is still mayor of Millington.

The 24 years have been among Millington's most productive years. That's why many expressed a sense of loss when Hall recently announced he would not seek a seventh term in office.

It was time to retire, he said.

He'll tell you in a minute, though, he loved those 24 years and feels like it hasn't been nearly that long.

"You know I had thought I'd serve one term, but it didn't work out that way," he said with his trademark grin from ear to ear.

"It sure doesn't feel like it's been that long," he added.

Since Hall has been mayor, much has transpired in Millington. From a politician's standpoint, he has led a fairy tale life.

He led a successful effort to annex the world's largest inland Navy base, into the city. The area of the base more than equalled the city's size.

He went into office with a budget deficit, but for years has had a balanced city budget. This fact was recently recognized when state figures showed the city was the second largest in the state to have no debt.

When he came to office the city had a $1.50 property tax rate. After going as high as 52, it will fall again in this last year in office to $1.50.

He has also led a 14-year struggle for approval of a $12 million wastewater treatment plant. Not only is the city getting the plant, but officials are now figuring the plant may not require any city funds because of grant money.

If you ask Mayor Hall what was his greatest accomplishment, he'll tell you he doesn't know.

"I just don't know how you could say. They were all important at the time," he said.

"I guess you could say the thing I'm most proud of is that the new man can take over (as mayor) with the largest among of CIP (Capital Improvement) funds in the history of the city," Hall said.

Citing that now is the time to enjoy life a little, Mayor Hall made his recent announcement in the face of "strong pressure" to run again.

"I really enjoy the work and all, but I've reached the age to retire and I want to enjoy it while I still have good health. I want to do some things," he said.

What exactly those "things" are is not really defined yet, he said.

"Hobbies, fishing, traveling, and I get the opportunity to spend some time with my grandchildren," he said.

Mayor Hall was born in 1921 in a small home on South Street to a carpenter-contractor. He graduated from Millington Central High School in 1939 and attended UT Martin from 1939 to 1940.

After working for DuPont a short time at the DuPont powder plant, he went into the Navy's Construction Battalion until 1945.

When he returned he went into the Western Auto business in 1948 on Navy Road, after working at some other jobs for short periods. He sold the store in 1962, but retained ownership of the buildings, which he now rents.

During this period he spent two years as a city alderman in 1953 and 54.

His final decision to run for city mayor in 1959 was made out of curiosity for the job, he said.

"I'd always been interested in city government and I had a lot of people encourage me to run," he said.

The former mayor had to leave office due to illness and left the remainder of his term to city Judge Charles Pruitt as specified in the City Charter.

During his years in office Hall built up good connections in the right places.

During a recent threat by the Navy to move some of the Chief of Naval Technical Training staff from the Naval Air Station, it was Hall who got on the phone to "friends in high places" to protest the move.

Although he declines to take credit for much of the work, other officials give him credit for successfully stopping the plans.

"What gets me is I've seen him in some precarious situations and he's always remained cool," one city alderman said.

"He's not a politician, he's an orator and a statesman. He's so eloquent and has a way with words," he added.

Hall was named Tennessee Municipal League Mayor of the Year in 1980 and received the Navy's Distinguished Citizen of the Year Award in 1977. In 1979 he received the Outstanding Civilian Award from Military Affairs council of the Memphis Area Chamber of Commerce.

Hall was president of the Tennessee Municipal League in 1974-75.

The mayor received numerous other awards during his career, including meritorious service awards from the Navy and the Mid-South Fair.

Although Mayor Hall can many times be seen working at his desk in an office with blinding red carpet, he does have a "few weak points."

He loves good cooking.

Most of the other employees at City Hall joke about his diets, which consist of abstaining from normal foods and indulging in the goodies brought to work.

Another of his quirks is seldom noticed. While sitting in his office behind a high stack of papers, a look under the desk will sometimes show this retirement age political veteran to be sporting tennis shoes.

CORRECTION OF ENROLLMENT OF H.R. 4169

Mr. BAKER. Madam President, on Thursday a concurrent resolution was offered by the distinguished Senator from Wyoming (Mr. SIMPSON) concerning technical corrections in a bill heretofore passed relating to veterans programs. That measure was put on the calendar by unanimous consent.

That bill appears today as calendar item No. 753, which is Senate Concurrent Resolution 102.

The leadership indicated on Thursday that after the matter had appeared on the calendar, it would be taken up, if cleared. I believe it has been cleared. My calendar indicates that the clearance process is completed on the side. I would inquire of the minority leader if he is prepared for us to proceed to the consideration of that item.

Mr. BYRD. Madam President, there is no objection on this side.

Mr. BAKER. I thank the minority leader.

Madam President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate Concurrent Resolution 102.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

The clerk will report.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

A concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 102) to correct the enrollment of H.R. 4169.

The Senate proceeded to consider the concurrent resolution.

(By request of Senator BAKER the following statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD.)

● Mr. SIMPSON. Madam President, I would urge my colleagues to join me in supporting the immediate passage of Senate Concurrent Resolution 102, making a technical correction in the enrollment of H.R. 4169, the budget reconciliation bill for fiscal year 1984. This resolution would direct the enrolling clerk to strike title 4 of the bill, relating to veterans' programs.

Madam President, all of the issues contained in title 4 of H.R. 4169 are moot. They were considered in the context of House-Senate discussions of the Veterans' Compensation and Program Improvements Amendments of 1983, S. 1388. All were subject to discussion, and compromise language was agreed upon and approved by both the House and Senate, and signed into law by the President on March 2, 1984, as Public Law 98-223. Moreover, quite aside from the mootness issue, I would note the considerable administrative difficulties of implementing back-to-back changes in the same provisions of law—with the added possibility of further amendments this year to restore the provisions to the form approved by the entire Congress in Public Law 98-223.

Madam President, this concurrent resolution will simply conform H.R. 4169 to other recent congressional action on the same veterans' issues. I urge its immediate adoption.●

● Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, I urge the Senate to approve Senate Concurrent Resolution 102, a concurrent resolution to direct the enrolling clerk of the House of Representatives to make a correction in the enrollment of H.R. 4169, the proposed "Omnibus Budget Reconciliation Act of 1983," as it was passed by the Senate last Thursday. Specifically, the enrolling clerk would be directed to strike out title IV of that measure, entitled "Committee on Veterans' Affairs."

Mr. President, during the Senate's consideration of H.R. 4169 last week, I became very concerned about the impact of the enactment of title IV of that measure on legislation which was signed into law on March 2 as Public Law 98-223, the Veterans' Compensation and Program Improvements Amendments of 1984. That legislation represented a compromise agreement derived from the provisions of S. 1388 as it was passed by the Senate last November and from title IV of H.R. 4169 as it was passed by the House last October. The compromise, painstakingly developed between the members of the House and Senate Veterans' Affairs Committees, addressed provisions set forth in both S. 1388 and H.R. 4169.

Deletion of title IV is truly a technical amendment since the Congress in enacting Public Law 98-223 clearly intended that title IV of H.R. 4169 be superseded and dropped in any further consideration of that measure.

Enactment of title IV of H.R. 4169 as passed by the House and now as passed by the Senate would be unnecessary, costly, unwise, and inefficient. It would, among other things, grant retroactively to April 1 a 4.1-percent compensation rate increase, in lieu of the 3.5-percent increase which became effective on April 1, which has already been programed into the VA's computer for the May 1 checks, and to which the Veterans' Affairs Committees and all the veterans organizations have agreed. The additional benefits cost would be $25.8 million for fiscal year 1984 and $249.5 million over the 5 fiscal year period. It would negate retroactively to October 1, 1983, a most complex agreement reached on the rates of compensation paid to certain blinded veterans who suffer from hearing losses and the agreement reached on the rate of compensation paid to certain hospitalized veterans. Finally, it would terminate the VA's authority for advanced payment of GI bill allowances at institutions of higher learning—a proposition to which I am strongly opposed and which the Senate rejected and the House receded from during the negotiations leading to Public Law 98-223.

However, Mr. President, because of the strong desire of the majority leader (Mr. BAKER) and the chairman of the Budget Committee (Mr. DOMENICI) that no amendments be adopted to H.R. 4169—a desire that was shared throughout the majority party—I refrained from offering an amendment last Thursday to delete the provisions of title IV since there would not have been the votes necessary for the approval of such an amendment.

Rather, at my request, just prior to final Senate action on H.R. 4169, a separate bill, S. 2539, was introduced by the majority leader (Mr. BAKER) and passed by the Senate to repeal the provisions of title IV effective September 30, 1983, the day before certain provisions in that title of the measure would become effective. Unfortunately, however, this separate bill was used as a vehicle for proposing a similar repealer of a 4-percent pay raise for Federal employees proposed in section 202 of H.R. 4169 as a substitute for the 3.5-percent Federal employee pay increase that became effective on January 1, 1984.

Because of complications I foresaw in securing House consideration of and agreement to S. 2539 with both those repealers in it, I felt it was necessary to send a separate measure to the House dealing solely with the veterans provisions. Thus, my good friend, the distinguished chairman of the Veterans' Affairs Committee (Mr. SIMPSON), and I initiated the concurrent resolution presently before the Senate and obtained the agreement of the leadership that it go immediately onto the calendar and be considered at the outset of business today.

Mr. President, we have taken this action in close consultation with the leadership of the House Veterans' Affairs Committee and with the Speaker. I understand that the resolution, if approved by the Senate at this time, will very rapidly be favorably considered in the other body, thereby directing that the enrollment change be made. This most desirable result will eliminate much confusion, inadvertent and unwise legislation, and major administrative disruption, to say nothing of unnecessary additional cost. It will also mean that the position of the Senate on the items I previously mentioned as they were negotiated in the compromise agreement will be maintained.

Mr. President, I want at this time to express my deep thanks to the Senator from Wyoming (Mr. SIMPSON) for his cooperation and assistance in moving forward on this matter and to his staff, Tony Principi, chief counsel of the Veterans' Affairs Committee, and Scott Wallace, general counsel of the committee, for their good work. My appreciation also to the staff assisting me, Ed Scott, minority general counsel, and Jon Steinberg, minority chief counsel.

I urge the Senate to approve Senate Concurrent Resolution 102.●

The concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 102) was considered and agreed to, as follows:

S. CON. RES. 102

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That in the enrollment of H.R. 4169, the Clerk of the House of Representatives is directed to make the corrections as follows: strike title IV.

Mr. BAKER. Madam President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the concurrent resolution was agreed to.

Mr. BYRD. Madam President, I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. BAKER. Madam President, if there is any time remaining, I yield back the remainder of the time.

MISCELLANEOUS TARIFF, TRADE, AND CUSTOMS MATTERS

The Senate continued with the consideration of H.R. 2163.

Mr. STENNIS. Madam President, will the Senator yield to me briefly?

Mr. BYRD. I yield.

Mr. STENNIS. Will the majority leader state where we are now? We could not fully hear back here.

Mr. BAKER. Madam President, I am happy to do that.

May I say to the distinguished Senator from Mississippi, the ranking member on the Appropriations Committee, that we are now resuming consideration of the boat bill, which is the measure which came over from the House to which we anticipate the Finance Committee tax package or revenue package will be offered as an amendment. That has not yet happened, but I anticipate that it will happen in the next few moments.

Mr. STENNIS. And that will proceed, then, under the regular rules of the Senate for amendment or further amendment?

Mr. BAKER. Yes. There is no agreement.

Mr. STENNIS. There is no limitation agreement?

Mr. BAKER. There is no agreement that alters the regular process.

Madam President, I yield the floor.

Mr. BYRD addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The minority leader.

Mr. BYRD. Madam President, I took the floor earlier today to express the hope that, when the tax amendment is offered today by the distinguished Senator from Kansas, the chairman of the Finance Committee (Mr. DOLE), there not be a cloture motion offered to that amendment immediately or early on.

I had heard some indications that there may be some concern that a cloture motion might be offered immediately upon the offering of the amendment.

Madam President, I would hope that the Senate would have an opportunity to debate this amendment and to amend it, if need be.

Madam President, the amendment before us which will be called up consists of 1,334 pages. Here it is in my hand. I have not weighed it, but it is a sizable amendment, as can be seen.

The explanation of the provisions for this tax amendment constitutes 1,010 pages—one thousand and ten pages of explanation. I would dare wager that no Senator in this body other than those Senators who are on the Committee on Finance knows what this amendment does. It is in the interest of an orderly procedure that Senators may have a reasonable length of time to offer their amendments before consideration is given to cloturing the amendment.

Madam President, I do not countenance the offering of dilatory amendments. I presently have no intention, as far as I know now, of offering any amendments to the measure as long as we can proceed in an orderly fashion, giving Senators who have legitimate amendments an opportunity to call up their amendments and to debate those amendments and get votes in relation thereto. I have no desire to stall the action on the tax amendment. I simply speak for orderly consideration and adequate time in which to have that consideration. I think I speak for Senators on both sides of the aisle.

I have discussed this matter with Mr. DOLE and Mr. LONG, the two managers of the amendment, and I have some indication that there would be a willingness to allow the debate to proceed for a reasonable length of time. I believe I correctly understood the chairman of the Finance Committee to say that as long as amendments were being offered that were reasonable amendments, that were not dilatory amendments, and that dealt with the contents of the amendment itself, he would not promote the invoking of cloture. I hope I have not misstated what was said to me, and he certainly is here to speak for himself.

I might, after a reasonable length of time, if it developed that Senators were calling up one nongermane amendment after another that did not directly or indirectly relate to the contents of this tax amendment and/or the overall final package that the Senate or some point, I suppose, will vote on, I might join in voting for cloture.

I think what I am saying is that I do not want to engage in any stalling action. I have never engaged in any stalling action since I have been a minority leader. I do not approve of such. At the same time, I do want Senators on both sides of the aisle to have whatever time they need for the offering of reasonable amendments, amendments that would obviously have a place and a justification for being offered, and I would hope that Senators would have that opportunity.

I am willing to proceed with the understanding that cloture will not be offered immediately and will not be offered until such time as Senators on both sides of the aisle have had an ample opportunity to offer amendments to this amendment. If I could have that understanding, I shall certainly not attempt to interpose any effort to delay the Senate from proceeding with the tax amendment forthwith.

Mr. BAKER. Madam President, we had a colloquy this morning on the floor at the opening, the minority leader and I, in which I indicated that it is not part of any plan or strategy I have to offer cloture immediately and that, indeed, that matter was brought up with the two managers in committee and other negotiators at the conversation. I am willing to proceed on any basis that the managers are willing to. I understand from a conversation that occurred on the floor a few moments ago that, for the time being, they do not wish the leadership to prepare and file a cloture motion. That is fine with me. I do not think that is any problem. The old adage says, do not take yes for an answer. My answer is yes, I am willing to not file for cloture as long as we are making progress on this bill.

I have no desire to try to contrive in any way to defeat the legitimate processes of the Senate. I would like to yield to my friend from Mississippi, but, also, I would like to hear from the distinguished chairman of the committee and, if he chooses, the ranking minority member as well.

If they are willing to proceed without cloture, it is certainly agreeable with me. That was not my plan to begin with. If they assure us that they want to go forward in that manner, the minority leader can be assured that there will be no effort by me to file cloture as long as the managers are willing to proceed and as long as we are making progress in an orderly manner.

Mr. STENNIS. Madam President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. BAKER. Madam President, I am happy to yield to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. STENNIS. I thank the leader for yielding to me.

I take the word fully here of our leaders and the Senator from Kansas, whatever he said, I take his word, of course. But I am vitally concerned about what is occurring here and there have been a lot of reports flying around about cloture and so forth. I am greatly interested in the so-called revenue bond issues being limited and curtailed and really cut off soon by time. That, itself, is a long story and a great many other kinds of bonds are included. It will just take a lot of time for all the Senators to get those matters out here. It takes a good deal for me.

I am in sympathy with wanting the legislation to move along fast and finally and, certainly, it ought not to be delayed. But it was very appropriate for the leader to give those assurances in view of the reports that were flying around.

I thank the leader for yielding.

Mr. BAKER. Madam President, I thank the Senator for asking. Let me reiterate, at the risk of overredundancy, speaking of reports flying around, I do not know where the reports came from except I want the Senator from Mississippi to know, as the minority leader knows, that it was not my idea in the first place to file a cloture motion. That was a suggestion by several groups, and if the managers want to go forward with that, that is their prerogative, but it is clear to me it is not their intention at this point, or my intention.

Mr. DOLE. Will the majority leader yield?

Mr. BAKER. Madam President, I yield the floor.

Mr. DOLE. Let me assure the Senate if things go as we hope they will, there will not be any need for cloture. I do not have any desire to file cloture. I do not think we have in any past tax bill that I have managed on the Senate floor. What we are concerned about is that last year, on the debt ceiling bill, we had amendments on Jordanian arms sales, on Lebanon, and perhaps a total of eight or nine foreign policy amendments. I know there are others floating around.

As long as we are presented with germane amendments and we have an opportunity to dispose of them by adoption or tabling or whatever, then we are not going to be in favor of filing cloture. But I do hope we understand we have some responsibility to take some deficit reduction action.

I know this is a large bill, $48 billion in revenue changes, $23 billion in spending changes. There are areas like IDB's and others that will need considerable time to discuss. I am willing to assure both leaders that we are not going to file cloture today or tomorrow. If things go along well on Wednesday and we are making progress, there is not much need to do it then, either. If, in fact, we are getting a lot of nongermane amendments coming out of the woodwork, perhaps then the leaders on both sides would help us and file a cloture motion.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, will the distinguished Senator yield?

Mr. DOLE. Yes, I yield.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I do not support the kind of amendments to which the distinguished Senator from Kansas has alluded. I certainly have no interest in the calling up of amendments that deal with the foreign policy of this country or any other subject area that is clearly out of the direct or indirect line of germaneness as it relates to this amendment. It might be that a Senator would want to call up some amendment that would, otherwise than by taxes, affect the budget or affect appropriations or whatever, I do not know.

But as to amendments that would be so far out, such as foreign policy amendments, I have no desire to see those amendments called up. And if the situation were to get to that point, I would be constrained to support cloture. I simply want Senators on both sides of the aisle to have adequate opportunity with their staffs to study this amendment and to know what is in it as best they can. I dare say that I will be one of the Senators who, in the final analysis, will be voting on this amendment and will not know exactly what is in it. I would like for any Senator other than a Senator on the Finance Committee who knows what is in this massive tax amendment to stand and say so now or later this afternoon; I may be seeking the advice of such Senator on the amendment. I would like to know for example, what happens to medicare, what happens to health services by virtue of this tax amendment.

So I am assured by what the distinguished Senator from Kansas has said, and I believe I understood him to say that as long as he clearly sees that amendments called up are legitimate, reasonable, germane or even nongermane, if they directly or indirectly affect this subject area, he will not rush to offer cloture. I believe him when he says that. I have only raised the issue today because, as Senator STENNIS has indicated, I heard some of the same rumors around. I am satisfied with the statement by the distinguished Senator and therefore, will not offer any objection to dispensing with the reading of the finance committee amendment at this time.

Mr. DOLE. I thank the minority leader, and again let me indicate that we are pleased we are this far along in the process. We would like to complete this bill this week, if not next week, but that is something to be determined by the leadership, not the managers of the bill. Obviously, if we are making progress, this Senator has no intention of filing cloture for the sake of filing cloture. I urge my colleagues to offer germane amendments and avoid the nongermane amendments, though there may be some who do not feel compelled to do that.

AMENDMENT NO. 2902

Mr. DOLE. If there is no objection—at the close of business on Thursday, the amendment was sent to the desk and ordered printed in the RECORD—I would now call up that amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Kansas (Mr. DOLE), for himself and Mr. LONG, proposes an amendment numbered 2902.

Mr. DOLE. Madam President, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The text of the amendment is printed in the RECORD of April 5, 1984, at page 8094.

Mr. DOLE. As the distinguished minority leader indicated, this amendment is some 1,300 pages long. It would take the better part of 2 days to read. Copies are available. The explanation of the amendment has been available since last Tuesday.

Madam President, we have before us the amendment from the Finance Committee. As indicated, it is a very lengthy amendment. It is a very important amendment, and I think it really indicates that we are now ready to go to work on the deficit. Maybe it is not as much as some would like, but it is part of the so-called down payment that many Members on both sides have talked about.

It may not be the perfect way to proceed. It may not be large enough in the eyes of some, but it is a substantial amount. Seventy-three billion dollars from the Finance Committee would indicate that at least, if we can adopt this first installment on the downpayment, that we will have made some progress. We would then move on to another part of the procedure, so that we would have an entire package in the neighborhood of $145 to $150 billion in deficit reduction over the next 3 years.

I do not know of any Member of this body who is for big deficits. I do not know of any Member of the other body who is for big deficits. It seems to me that we have had enough speechmaking about deficits, so I am pleased that we are starting on the legislative process, which is taking place, finally, at this very moment.

I have watched with interest the House proceedings as they voted up and down seven or eight budget resolutions. I remind my colleagues that the House budget resolutions have no impact on the deficit at all. Anybody can offer a budget resolution, and whether it succeeds or fails makes very little difference. We need legislative action which has an impact on the deficit. Resolutions do not force the kinds of tough decisions needed to cut spending and raise revenue.

I will not recite the familiar reasons why we must control the budget: first, because it would take too long; and, second, I have a bad cold.

I read in the morning paper that car loans are now being impacted by the increase in the interest rates, that home mortgage loan rates are going to be increased by the increase in the prime interest rates, and this may have an adverse impact on the housing industry by midsummer.

I have been in my State for the last 2 days, talking with farmers and others who indicated that cattle operating loans are going up a bit. They reiterated their position that they believe that the best farm bill we could pass would be one to lower the interest rates. That is the view of some farmers.

So I think it is fairly obvious that the most threatening cloud over this recovery—and we are in a recovery—is the big deficit.

I assume that, during the debate, some Members will assign blame to different administrations or whatever, but the reality is that Congress has some responsibility—some responsibility in creating the deficit, and certainly some responsibility in reducing the deficit.

I wish to indicate what happened in the Senate Finance Committee. I am not boasting about our committee, but we spent more than 30 days working at this big bill; and I thank the distinguished minority leader for suggesting that some of us may understand it all. I would not want to bet the store on that proposition. We understand a little about each provision. Senator LONG may understand it all, but the chairman does not.

When we completed action, even though we had some differences on the various parts, the vote on the final product was 20 to 0, and we have only 20 members on the committee—11 Republicans and 9 Democrats. Every member of the Finance Committee voted for the product. It is my hope that the members of the Finance Committee will form a nucleus for support of the bill to help us retain this package.

That does not suggest that there might be good amendments lurking out there that should not be adopted; but if they lose revenue, it is going to be difficult for us to accept those amendments, unless there is some offset. Then, perhaps we can work out an accommodation.

I am told that there may be 30 amendments floating around, which is not too many for a tax bill. The Senator from Ohio advised me that he has about that many but that he is willing to move with some dispatch on his amendments.

So the point I wish to make is that we understand that the stakes are high. We believe that if we put together something that finally passes Congress and reaches the President's desk—something in the neighborhood of $140 to $160 billion or $170 billion over a 3-year period—it will have a positive impact on the markets, and we hope it will have an impact on interest rates. I am not an expert, but at least it should have some impact on interest rates, and it will be an indication to the American people—Democrats and Republicans or independents or whatever—that we are not suffering from total paralysis in Congress.

I have said on this floor before that I hope the administration would be a little more aggressive in their efforts for deficit reduction. I am very pleased to say now—not because of anything I have said—that the President is fully on board; that virtually every provision in the tax bill, as I understand it, has the blessing of the administration; that everything done in the Finance Committee, so far as spending reduction is concerned, has the blessing of the administration.

In fact, we were asked that question by different members as we went through the bill: "Is this provision supported by the President or supported by the administration?" I think I can safely say—there may be a few exceptions—that nearly every provision is supported by the administration.

We did make changes in some of the health programs. We considered spending reductions in our committee before we considered revenue changes, because many members indicated that they would not vote for revenue changes unless they were certain we would do something on the spending side. So we did something on the spending side—not as much as some would like, maybe a little more than others would like. But we had a unanimous vote on most of these provisions.

Madam President, we continue to hear a lot of rhetoric in this body, and on the campaign trail, about the problem of the deficit. It is easy to get agreement that we need a serious effort to begin closing the budget gap. But, as the members of the Finance Committee have found over the past few months, it is not so easy when you get down to specific policies and programs. Speeches lamenting our budget problem may be fashionable, but they do not take one dime of the deficit.

The fact is that it is easy to vote for resolutions and issue press releases. But neither of those things force the kind of tough decisions needed to cut spending and raise revenue. But with the legislation now before us, we finally find ourselves in a position to do something about those deficits we regularly decry.

I will not recite the familiar reasons why we must get control of the budget. Senators are by now painfully aware of the damage that yearly $200 billion deficits would inflict on our recovering economy. Instead, I pose just one question: Is there a Senator, Congressman, business, or labor leader, economist, or President who would not feel better about our economic future if the deficit was lower?

The answer is obvious. The most threatening cloud on the economic horizon is the deficit. Enacting a significant deficit-reduction package would cause consumer and business confidence to soar. I offer as proof the tremendous response to the passage of TEFRA in 1982. This display of congressional responsibility caused interest rates to tumble and set off a stock market rally that pushed up equity nearly 60 percent in a year. TEFRA helped set the stage for a vigorous economic expansion that has brought the unemployment rate down by 2.9 percentage points: The strongest labor market recovery since 1948.

The stakes this year are different, but no less important. TEFRA helped to kick the economy off dead center; this year our goal is to remove the major impediment to a prolonged, balanced, noninflationary recovery.

No one in this Chamber needs convincing: We all are for lower deficits. The question is how to get there. To bring it off will require courage, skill, and compromise.

We now have a chance to enact a package that is balanced and fair. The goal—slicing $150 billion off the cumulative deficit of $500 to $600 billion we anticipate over the next 3 years—may in fact be too modest. But it is a goal we can reach, and it is far more than many believed we would do just a few months ago. Even if we do not touch off a ticker-tape parade down Wall Street, at least we can dispel some of the gloom that has been plaguing the financial markets.

Make no mistake, this is only a downpayment on future deficit reduction. By enacting this package in an election year, Congress and the administration will be making a good faith commitment that we will do whatever is necessary to cut deficits and keep the recovery alive in 1985.

We all wish this package were larger. But we have to be realistic. Any amendment to increase revenues significantly above the level that the Finance and Ways and Means Committees have reported likely would attract a veto. And while I would favor deeper spending cuts, the votes just are not there in this election year.

So this is a balanced, but fragile package. The Finance Committee provisions would share $72.5 billion from deficits through fiscal year 1987, including $24.5 billion in outlay savings and $48 billion in revenue gains. In addition, the work of other committees contained in this bill would reduce outlays by another $9.8 billion.

It seems to this Senator that is worth the effort. And once this bill is enacted, I am willing to support any responsible effort to do more to lower deficits.

HEALTH PROGRAMS

Madam President, the spending reductions proposed by the committee include measures already pending in S. 2062, with some modifications agreed to this year, plus some new proposals. For the most part, they affect medicare, the largest health program under the jurisdiction of the committee. In considering spending reductions the committee was concerned with the rate of growth in the medicare program.

The administration estimates that current law benefit and administrative outlays under medicare will be $76.8 billion in fiscal year 1985.

I might add that that is a program we started out, I think, at $4.7 billion in 1967.

Of this amount, benefit payments will account for $74.8 billion. This represents an increase of 15.9 percent over fiscal year 1984 benefit payments of $64.6 billion.

Both in terms of total outlays and total benefits per enrollee receiving reimbursement, the rate of growth for part B of medicare, the "supplementary medical insurance program," continues to exceed that for part A, the hospital insurance program. The increase in part A benefits per enrollee receiving care are 58 percent higher than the projected fiscal year 1985 medical care component of the CPI, but the increase in part B benefits are 100 percent higher.

In medicare the spending provisions primarily address part B, the supplementary medical insurance (SMI) program. In fiscal year 1984, the general fund of the U.S. Treasury will have to contribute an estimated $16.8 billion to the SMI trust fund in order to keep it solvent. That general fund obligation is expected to grow by 13.3 percent to $19 billion in fiscal year 1985.

The major provision affecting SMI would hold reasonable charges of all physicians to prior year levels for a 12-month period, followed by a limited fee freeze imposed on those physicians who do not accept assignment over the next 12 months.

Along with the freeze, a voluntary participating system would be established for medicare. By agreeing to accepting assignment in advance for all services for all medicare patients, participating physicians would agree to accept the medicare determined allowance as payment in full except for cost-sharing amounts. Nonparticipating physicians could continue to accept or reject assignment on a claim-by-claim basis.

This limit on physician payments under part B is designed to moderate the double digit growth that has occurred in physician fees.

They have gone up, as I recall, an average of about 11 percent per year.

We have worked on this, I might suggest, with the American Medical Association, and with other physician groups. They have committed themselves to helping us work out some way to dissuade physicians from passing on the costs to beneficiaries which would not be a very happy result.

I might say there is a feature piece in this week's National Journal, which came to our office this morning, discussing physicians' fees and how we are going to control these in the outyears.

Madam President, we would like to know that our actions effectively limit any shifting of cost savings intended for physicians onto beneficiaries. While this Senator understands that it is not feasible to monitor each individual physician's response, we do expect the Secretary to very closely monitor any fees. While some physicians may want to accept fewer medicare assignments as a result of this proposal, the committee has included provisions to offer incentives for physicians to take assignment and better inform beneficiaries as to which physicians do so.

For example, the Secretary would establish electronic billing transmission lines and simplified billing procedures for beneficiaries with approved medigap or group health insurance coverage. In addition, the Secretary would be required to publish lists indicating the assignment experience for each physician and establish toll-free hot lines for the same purpose. This should help beneficiaries to better select physicians who take assignment.

The committee proposals to increase the financial stake of beneficiaries should help bring cost sharing more in line with the cost of the benefits provided under part B. In fiscal year 1984 each premium dollar being paid by beneficiaries is being matched by $3.40 from the U.S. Treasury to keep the SMI program solvent. Without the committee's premium provision, by fiscal year 1990 the U.S. Treasury will have to match each beneficiary dollar with $4.60 to maintain the trust fund solvency of SMI.

Madam President, we are aware of the pending insolvency in the hospital insurance trust fund, part A of medicare. Congress has acted to restrain growth of hospital costs, the largest single component of part A's cost, but that will not be enough. To bring the part A trust fund into actuarial balance will require a great deal more effort by the committee. Our proposals cannot restore the part A trust fund to solvency, but they are a necessary first step.

Hospital insurance, part A, benefits for fiscal year 1985 are projected to be $50.7 billion, $6.6 billion or 15 percent higher than fiscal year 1984. Inpatient hospital services will account for 95 percent of part A benefit payments.

The major provision in our bill which reduces spending, limits the rate of increase in payment to hospitals. We recognize the tremendous improvement that has been made in the health status of the elderly by medicare, and in considering spending reductions we sought to protect one of the most important programs the Nation offers its citizens.

Our bill also makes a few changes in the medicaid program. The administration project total Federal-State medicaid costs for fiscal year 1985 at a $41.4 billion: The Federal share is $23.2 billion. This is a 14.5-percent increase over fiscal year 1984, attributable in part to the discontinuation of the current 4.5-percent reduction in Federal payments.

The principal medicaid change is to extend the current reduction in Federal matching payments to the States for 3 more years. The reduction would be set at 3 rather than 4.5 percent, but offsets which allow the States to decrease the Federal reduction would be permitted as under current law. The committee also recommends outlay increases for children and pregnant women through the medicaid program and maternal and child health block grant, as well as increased medicaid spending ceilings for Puerto Rico and the territories.

Madam President, given the size of the Federal deficit, the health program proposals recommended by the committee do make sensible spending reductions but they also reflect the committee's concern for directing spending to where it is most needed, including modest increases where appropriate.

So I suggest that the things that we did do in this health care field were minimal indeed.

And I also suggest that we had good bipartisan support for all of those proposals.

INCOME MAINTENANCE PROGRAMS

The Finance Committee carefully reviewed the entitlement programs which fall within the income maintenance area. A limited number of provisions were adopted by the committee dealing with the aid to families with dependent children (AFDC) program and the supplemental security income (SSI) program. The provisions approved generally deal with overlapping benefits and administrative simplification and efficiency.

The two AFDC provisions with the greatest budget impact are the requirement for a standard AFDC assistance filing unity and the requirement that a minor AFDC parent must live with her own parents when possible. Both of these provisions were adopted by the Finance Committee and the Senate last year, but were dropped in conference with the House. The changes are supported by the American Public Welfare Association and were adopted by the committee without disagreement.

The other AFDC provisions and the single SSI provision are basically technical in nature, clarifying provisions in the law dealing with the earned income disregards the use of community work experience programs by Federal agencies and, in the SSI program, a clarification of the procedures to be used to recoup overpayments under that program. An amendment was adopted by the committee which would provide that the earnings of a full-time student would be excluded from consideration when determining a family's eligibility for AFDC benefits. This amendment has a negligible cost and conforms the treatment of student earnings with that established for earnings under the Job Training Partnership Act of 1982.

Madam President, the proposals approved by the Finance Committee in the income maintenance area were approved basically because they represented good policy. Some have deficit reduction impact, others have no impact or a negligible impact. We believe they represent worthwhile reforms in these important social welfare programs.

SOCIAL SECURITY PROVISIONS

The committee bill includes several changes in social security, most of which are of a technical nature. The one important exception is a provision which modifies the coverage of certain religious organizations under social security. As my colleagues will recall, the 1983 Social Security Amendments extended mandatory social security coverage to the employees of all nonprofit organizations—including churches and other religious organizations. Rather than allowing voluntary participation, as under prior law, such organizations are now required to withhold the social security (FICA) tax from each employee and also pay the employer share of the tax. This provision has created a great deal of confusion and concern among members of the religious community, who saw this as a serious violation of the separation of church and state.

At the urging of Senator JEPSEN, the Finance Committee held a public hearing on this issue in December. As he correctly pointed out, the merits of altering the law with regard to religious organizations was not seriously debated as an issue distinct from the coverage of all other nonprofits.

I was sympathetic to the concerns raised at this hearing and set up an informal working group of pastors and representatives to work out a compromise. The amendment approved by the committee is the by-product of those efforts.

Under the committee amendment, certain churches and church-controlled organizations, opposed for religious reasons to the payment of social security taxes, would be permitted to treat their employees similarly to the self-employed for purposes of social security. The church or other organizations would thereby be relieved of both the obligation to pay the employer FICA tax and also the obligation to withhold the employees' FICA tax. While not everyone is satisfied, I believe this is a good provision which meets the chief objections of the churches while maintaining coverage for employees. employees will thus be assured protection under the retirement, disability, and hospital insurance programs of social security.

Modifying the social security financing package approved last year is a difficult task, and one that must be approached with great caution. I believe the merits of the case for change here are strong.

GRACE COMMISSION SAVINGS

The Finance Committee is indebted to the Grace Commission for pointing the way for us to achieve savings of $3.1 billion over the next 3 years. The committee accepted three Grace recommendations for reducing fraud and abuse, and increasing the efficiency of Government, and again I think I can fairly say with strong bipartisan support or with very little opposition.

The first of these provisions would yield savings in means-tested benefit programs by making tax return information on unearned income available to the Department of Health and Human Services for use in verifying eligibilty for the SSI, AFDC, and Medicaid programs. Confidentiality of the information would be protected by the same sanctions that apply to unauthorized disclosure of earned income data, which currently is made available to the Social Security Administration. The provision also would require States to use both earned and unearned income data to police their programs, and to maintain a source of quarterly wage information. CBO estimates savings from the AFDC, SSI, and medicaid, and unemployment insurance programs of $660 million over the next 3 fiscal years.

The second provision would require the Secretary of the Treasury to implement methods for accelerating the collection and deposit of Federal nontax receipts. Such methods may include electronic funds transfers, automatic account withdrawals, and the use of lockboxes. CBO estimates savings of $1.6 billion over 3 years would be achieved.

The final Grace proposal we accepted in our committee would authorize the Internal Revenue Service, I might say over their strong objection, to offset nontax delinquent debt owed to the Federal Government against tax refunds. Such debt would have to be certified as delinquent by the Federal agencies, and it must be shown that the debtor does not contest the debt before the offset could be applied. Estimated savings from this provision are $800 million over 3 years.

In other words, if someone had a student loan or farm loan or some other loan and they had a refund coming, the IRS will grab the refund and apply it to the debt. That makes a lot of sense to me. It did not make IRS Commissioner Roscoe Egger, too happy. But it should make the taxpayers happy, and I think that is the important thing.

REVENUE PROVISIONS—S. 2062

Madam President, the revenue provisions of this expanded reconciliation package address a wide range of problems in the tax laws with the goal of raising revenue by correcting abuses and advancing the cause of tax equity and greater administrative efficiency. We have put the primary emphasis on tax reform, and have done our best to minimize the impact on the average taxpayer.

Of the measures agreed to last fall and pending in S. 2062, probably the most important is the provision limiting tax benefits available for property leased to or otherwise used by tax-exempt entities, including the U.S. Government. The bill would reduce depreciation benefits for such property, put limitations on investment tax credits in certain instances, and set forth criteria for determining when an arrangement should be treated as a lease for Federal income tax purposes. Together these changes should prevent abuse of the tax laws to provide back-door financing for Government projects. The pending House tax bill, H.R. 4170, contains a similar provision.

In addition, the provisions of S. 2062 as now pending include postponing the net interest exclusion scheduled to take effect in 1985; scaling back the benefits from income averaging; requiring estimated tax payments for the alternative minimum tax; bringing stock options under the tax straddle rules; eight changes designed to improve tax compliance in particular areas; and several others, as described in the report on S. 2062. I would also remind Members that S. 2062 also would reduce the holding period for capital gains to 6 months, a provision that many Members are interested in. This change would be accommodated by reducing the ordinary income ceiling against which capital losses may be deducted from $3,000 to $1,000 and changing the treatment of long-term losses realized before 1970.

ADDITIONAL PROVISIONS

Beginning in late February the Finance Committee undertook a review of the Tax Code to identify further changes in the law that, combined with the provision of S. 2062, could generate $50 billion or so over 3 years. We have agreed on a number of significant tax reforms, and some small tax increases, to meet that goal. In fact, our package generates enough additional revenue to accommodate some revenue-losing tax changes that the President and a number of Members have been seeking for some time.

On the revenue-raising side, perhaps the single most significant item is a series of new rules designed to prevent tax shelter and other abuses.

I might point out this issue of Newsweek has a cover story of tax shelters. We are going through that to see if there are any in there that they wish to add to this bill.

These rules are based on Treasury Department proposals contained in the fiscal year 1985 budget, and address such areas as partnership allocation of expenses and income, interest deductions on discount obligations, transactions between related parties, current deductions for future liabilities, and corporate deductions for extraordinary dividends received. A similar package is included in the House Ways and Means Committee bill, H.R. 4170.

Our committee also agreed to changes in the law that will take some of the benefit out of tax shelters in the real estate area. Both new and used structures would be depreciated over 20 years rather than 15 years as under present law, and all depreciation recapture income realized in an installment sale of real property would be recognized at the time of sale.

We are hearing some loud cries from some in the real estate industry, particularly the National Association of Realtors, who had a different idea. We raised about $4.2 billion from real estate depreciation charges. Before the committee acted, we met with all the interested real groups. We struggled for a couple of weeks, trying to find some compromise that would satisfy the legitimate concerns of the realtors and other groups. After failing to find any other suitable provision, the real depreciation provision in committee bill was agreed to with rather substantial bipartisan support. I hope that we will have an opportunity to get into this more in detail. These changes can improve tax policy by making it less likely that investment decisions in the real estate area will be made on the basis of tax considerations, rather than the economic substance of transactions.

Another change the committee agreed to reduces a profitable corporation's ability to pay dividends tax free. This is achieved by modifying the definition of earnings and profits used for determining whether dividends are tax free, so that it more closely reflects a corporation's economic income rather than its taxable income. The goal of this provision is to prevent shareholders from avoiding tax on a portion of dividends in situations where the current earnings and profits rules understate economic income.

The bill would scale back other unwarranted tax advantages for business, such as by increasing the reduction in certain corporate tax preferences from 15 to 20 percent, requiring capitalization of construction period interest and taxes on residential property—other than low-income housing—and reducing tax benefits available for business property if more than 10 percent of the property's use is for personal purposes. We also impose some fairly modest new restrictions on the use of industrial development bonds, designed to help target such tax-exempt financing to areas of greatest need.

I know that this is a matter we will want to discuss later with the distinguished Senior Senator from Mississippi and others.

Besides tax reform and antiabuse measures such as I have described, the bill does propose some small tax increases: A 3-year extension of the telephone tax and a $2 per proof gallon increase in the distilled spirits tax. We also would change the heavy vehicle use tax provisions of the 1982 Surface Transportation Act to more equitably distribute the burden of such taxes among users of the Nation's highway system, and delay the certain tax relief measures scheduled under current law, such as the finance lease rules and the increase in the foreign earned income exclusion.

Now, we did add a few things, Madam President. I know that some of these have been noted by the distinguished Senator from Ohio in a letter that he directed to members of the committee.

TAX INCENTIVES

Madam President, as I indicated earlier, the Finance Committee adopted enough revenue-raising measures to make room for a number of new tax incentives and for the extension of certain expiring provisions that have strong support in the Congress. These include a 3-year extension of the targeted jobs tax credit; the new FSC system of taxing export income of foreign sales corporations; making permanent the 25-percent credit for incremental research and experimental expenditures; authorizing up to 75 enterprise zones over 3 years to stimulate growth in depressed areas; increasing the limit on contributions to a spousal IRA, so that over a 7-year period it will reach the level that applies to spouses who work outside the home; and helping low-income households by raising the percentage and the phase-out level of the earned income credit. Major revisions of the rules governing life insurance taxation and private foundations are included. We also extend the mortgage revenue bond program, in conjunction with authorizing mortgage credit certificates for first-time home buyers. We believe all of these are sound provisions that strengthen our package while remaining consistent with the overriding goal of restoring a measure of fiscal sanity to the Federal Government.

We understand that, in view of the fiscal problems, there may be some question about adopting any of those. I think that is a matter that the Senate will probably be asked to vote on as we get into those particular areas.

In sum, Madam President, I believe we have a good bill that deserves the enthusiastic support of all Members. It strikes an appropriate balance among spending reductions, administrative reforms, and changes that improve the equity of the tax laws. There is much more to be done on the deficit problem than what is contained in this bill, including major savings in defense and nondefense appropriated funds. But this bill makes a very good start, and start we must if we are to have a significant impact on the deficit this year.

Madam President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point a summary of the provisions that I have just referred to. I think this will be most helpful to Members as they start to address the different provisions of the bill.

There being no objection, the summary was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

II. SUMMARY OF PROVISIONS

TITLE I.—TAX REFORMS GENERALLY

A. DEFERRAL OF CERTAIN TAX REDUCTIONS

1. Investment credit for used property

Under present law, the maximum amount of used property eligible for the investment credit is scheduled to increase from $125,000 to $150,000 in 1985. The bill freezes the amount eligible for the credit at $125,000 through 1987, after which this limit increases to $150,000.

2. Finance leasing

Under present law, liberalized leasing rules for agreements relating to limited use property or containing fixed price purchase options become effective on January 1, 1984. The bill postpones that effective date for four years. Present liberalized leasing rules are continued for up to $150,000 of farm equipment and for certain automotive manufacturing property. In addition, general transition rules are provided.

3. Expensing of business personal property

Under present law, the amount of personal property which businesses may elect to expense each year is scheduled to increase from $5,000 in 1983 to $7,500 in 1984 and 1985 and to $10,000 thereafter. The bill freezes the maximum amount that can be expensed at $5,000 through 1987, increasing it to $7,500 in 1988 and 1989 and $10,000 thereafter.

4. Telephone excise tax

Under present law, the 3-percent telephone excise tax is scheduled to expire after 1985. Under the bill, the 3-percent tax remains in effect through 1987.

5. Net interest exclusion

Under present law, starting in 1985, individuals will be able to exclude 15 percent of interest income to the extent such income exceeds certain interest deductions, up to a maximum exclusion of $450 for single persons and $900 for married couples. The bill postpones this net interest exclusion until 1988.

6. Foreign earned income

Under present law, the maximum amount of income earned abroad excluded from taxable income is $80,000 for 1983, and is scheduled to increase in $5,000 annual increments to a permanent level of $95,000 in 1986. The bill freezes the amount of the exclusion at $80,000 until 1988 and increases it in $5,000 increments to $95,000 in 1990.

B. TAX-EXEMPT ENTITY LEASING

Present law

The Federal income tax benefits of ownership of property generally include accelerated depreciation deductions and investment tax credits. Essentially, the law is that the economic substance of a transaction, not its form, determines who is entitled to the tax benefits associated with ownership. Thus, in a lease or similar arrangement, the person claiming ownership for Federal income tax purposes must show that he has sufficient economic indicia of ownership.

The tax benefits of ownership are generally allowed only for property used for a business or income-producing purpose. They are not available for property that is owned by governmental units and tax-exempt organizations. Property that is used (though not owned) by a tax-exempt organization or a domestic governmental unit qualifies for accelerated cost recovery (ACRS) or other depreciation deductions but generally does not qualify for investment credits. A statutory exception to the investment credit limitation provides that qualified rehabilitation expenditures for a building leased to a tax-exempt organization or a governmental unit can qualify for the rehabilitation tax credit. Also, one court has held, and the Internal Revenue Service (IRS) has ruled, that investment credits can be claimed where a governmental unit essentially contracts not for the use of property itself, but rather for a service to be provided by the owner of the property.

Property used by a foreign government or person is not subject to the nontaxable use restriction. However, if the property is used predominantly outside the United States, generally ACRS deductions are slowed down and no investment credit is allowed.

Only 50 percent of the investment credit otherwise allowable is allowable with respect to property owned by a thrift institution, but no such limitation specifically applies with respect to property leased to it. Furthermore, certain property owned by or leased to a public utility is subject to special depreciation and investment credit rules. However, those rules are not specifically applicable to property used to provide services to the public utility.

The bill

In general, the bill reduces the tax benefits available for certain property that is leased to or otherwise used by tax-exempt entities. Under the bill, tax-exempt entities include the United States, any State or local governmental unit, possessions of the United States, and most agencies and instrumentalities of any of the foregoing. The term also includes (1) organizations (other than farmers' cooperatives described in section 521) exempt from United States income tax and certain formerly exempt organizations and (2) certain foreign persons or entities.

The bill generally requires that ACRS or other depreciation deductions for property used by tax-exempt entities be computed using the straight-line method over a recovery period equal to the greater of the present class life of the property under the Asset Depreciation Range (ADR) system (40 years in the case of 15-year or 20-year real property) or, in the case of property subject to a lease, 125 percent of the term of the lease. In the case of 15-year or 20-year real property, this provision applies to the extent of use of a type or types specified in the bill, but only if more than 50 percent (35 percent in the case of use of a type or types specified in the bill by one tax-exempt entity and related tax-exempt entities) of the property is so used. The depreciation rules of the bill do not apply to certain short-lived property. Depreciation deductions for property used by foreign persons or entities will be computed using the 175-percent declining balance method over a specified number of years for property placed in service in 1984 and the 150-percent declining balance method over a specified number of years for property placed in service after 1984.

The bill also provides criteria for determining whether a transaction that is structured as a service contract or other arrangement should be treated as a lease for all Federal income tax purposes. The rehabilitation credit will be denied for tax-exempt use real property. Finally, lessors will not be entitled to investment credits with respect to property leased to thrift institutions in excess of the credits that would have been allowed to the lessee had the lessee owned the property. Property used by foreign persons or entities and currently eligible for the investment credit is restricted to one-half of the credit if placed in service in 1984. If placed in service after 1984, such property generally is ineligible for the credit.

The bill does not apply to property leased to a tax-exempt entity for a short term. For depreciation purposes, a short-term lease is a lease with a term not in excess of 1 year or 30 percent of the property ADR mid-point life (but not more than 3 years), whichever is greater. For investment credit purposes, a short-term lease is generally a lease of less than 6 months, although for certain property, the depreciation short-term lease rule applies.

The bill generally applies to property placed in service by the taxpayer after May 23, 1983, and to property used under an agreement entered into after that date. However, transitional rules are provided.

C. TREATMENT OF BONDS AND OTHER DEBT INSTRUMENTS

1. Debt obligations acquired at a discount

a. Market discount

Under present law, upon the disposition of a market-discount bond issued by a corporation or a governmental unit and held for more than one year, capital gain treatment is accorded to the appreciation in value attributable to market discount. When a taxpayer borrows the funds used to purchase a market-discount bond, interest on the acquisition indebtedness generally can be deducted currently against ordinary income. Thus, a taxpayer who leverages the purchase of a market-discount bond effectively converts ordinary income to capital gain.

The bill generally requires that gain on disposition of a market discount bond be recognized as interest income, to the extent of accrued market discount. This provision is effective for bonds issued after the date of enactment.

The bill also limits a taxpayer's ability to take current interest deductions on indebtedness incurred to purchase or carry a market discount bond. This change is effective for bonds acquired after the date of enactment. For bonds issued before date of enactment but acquired after date of enactment, gain will be recharacterized as ordinary income to the extent of deferred interest deductions.

The bill provides an election to include accrued market discount in income currently. Neither the rule requiring ordinary income treatment on disposition nor the rule limiting interest deductions will apply to bonds with respect to which the election is made.

b. Original issue discount on tax-exempt bonds

Under the Code, original issue discount (OID) on certain obligations issued by a State or local government is exempt from tax. Under Internal Revenue Service rulings, tax-exempt OID is apportioned on a straight-line basis among the original holder and subsequent purchasers of a bond. The application of this rule may permit the holder of a deep discount municipal bond to generate an artificial loss by disposing of the bond prior to maturity.

The bill requires the holders of tax-exempt obligations to accrue tax-exempt OID by using the constant interest method provided by present law for the holders of obligations issued by corporations and other entities. Under the bill, the basis of an obligation is increased by the amount of accrued tax-exempt OID. Thus, the holder of a zero coupon municipal bond will be able to claim economic losses realized on disposition of the bond. These changes apply to bonds issued after September 3, 1982, and acquired after March 1, 1984.

c. Discount on short-term obligations

For governmental obligations (Treasury bills) issued at a discount and payable without interest at a fixed maturity not exceeding one year, the acquisition discount is not considered under present law to accrue until the obligation is paid at maturity or otherwise disposed of. A similar rule applies with respect to original issue discount on other obligations with a maturity of one year or less (e.g., bank certificates of deposit). Taxpayers who make leveraged purchases of obligations eligible for the special rules are able to defer tax liability on unrelated income.

The bill limits the ability to use leveraged purchases of short-term obligations within the special rules to defer tax on ordinary income by deferring the deductions for interest on indebtedness used to purchase or carry short-term discount obligations. An election is provided under which taxpayers can avoid application of the interest deferral rule by electing to include acquisition and original issue discount in income as it accrues.

This provision will be effective for obligations acquired after the date of enactment.

D. TAX TREATMENT OF CORPORATIONS AND THEIR SHAREHOLDERS

1. Dividends received by corporations

a. Debt-financed portfolio stock

Under present law, when a corporation borrows funds used to purchase dividend-paying stock, interest on the acquisition indebtedness is generally deductible against ordinary income. Dividends received by a corporation are eligible for an 85-percent dividends received deduction. Thus, a corporation that borrows to finance purchases of portfolio stock effectively converts some ordinary income to dividend income, which is taxed at a maximum rate of 6.9 percent.

Under the bill, the dividends received deduction is reduced by an amount determined by reference to interest paid or accrued on debt that is directly attributable to the investment in the underlying stock. The provision applies to stock the holding period for which begins after the date of enactment.

b. Dividends from regulated investment companies

Under present law, a mutual fund, or regulated investment company (RIC), is not subject to Federal income tax if it distributes its income to its shareholders. If at least 75 percent of a RIC's gross income consists of dividends from domestic corporations, then the entire amount of the RIC's dividends to its shareholders is eligible for the 85-percent intercorporate dividends received deduction and the $100 dividend exclusion for individuals. Taxpayers have organized RICs to take advantage of this tax provision that permits the conversion of interest income into dividend income.

Under the bill, the 75-percent rule of present law is raised to 95 percent. The provision applies with respect to taxable years of a RIC beginning after the date of enactment.

c. Extraordinary dividends

Under present law, dividends received by a corporation generally have no effect on its basis in the stock of the distributing corporation. As a result, a corporation can buy stock for $100, receive a $15 extraordinary dividend on it, and then in short order sell the stock for $85. While some portion (generally 15 percent) of the $15 dividend will be taxed as ordinary income to the recipient corporation, the transaction, which may have no significant economic consequences, will also generate $15 of short-term capital loss on the sale of the stock. This is an attractive transaction for corporations that have capital gains which can be sheltered by the loss on the sale of stock.

Under the bill, if a corporate shareholder does not hold stock for more than one year, the fair market value of any extraordinary dividend (to the extent not subject to tax) reduces its basis in the stock. Extraordinary dividends include dividends received within any 85-day period with a fair market value equal to or greater than 10 percent (5 percent in the case of preferred stock) of the taxpayer's basis in the stock. This change applies to distributions after the date of enactment.

In general, the holding period is limited to exclude, among other periods, any period during which the taxpayer is the grantor of a deep-in-the-money option with respect to the stock, or any period that the taxpayer's risk of loss is diminished because of holding substantially similar positions. A similar rule is adopted for purposes of all the holding period rules applicable to the dividends received deduction. Broker-dealers who hold stocks for sale to customers or as hedges will be exempt from the "risk of loss" rule. This holding period provision applies to stock acquired after the date of enactment.

A corporate shareholder's holding period for property received as a dividend with respect to stock is limited so that it cannot exceed its holding period for such stock. This change applies with respect to stock acquired after the date of enactment.

2. Ordinary nonliquidating dividends of appreciated property

Generally, under present law, a distribution of appreciated property (such as interests in an oil and gas royalty trust) by a corporation with respect to its stock is not a taxable event to the distributing corporation.

Under the bill, in general, an ordinary nonliquidating distribution of appreciated property is taxable to the distributing corporation. Certain exceptions are provided. The provision applies with respect to distributions declared after March 15, 1984, with transition rules.

3. Transactions in mutual fund shares

Under present law, mutual fund distributions from net capital gain income are taxed as long-term capital gain to shareholders even when made to a shareholder who holds the share for one year or less. If a shareholder who has held a share of a mutual fund for less than 31 days sells such share at a loss after a capital gain dividend has been received, the loss is treated as long-term rather than short-term to the extent of the capital gain dividend. Similar rules apply to real estate investment trusts.

Under the bill, losses on mutual fund stock held 6 months or less are treated as long-term losses to the extent of any capital gain dividends paid on the stock. There is an exception for periodic redemption plans. A similar rule is provided for real estate investment trusts. The provision applies to losses with respect to shares of stock with respect to which the taxpayer's holding period begins after the date of enactment.

4. Expenses incurred in connection with short sales

A short sale is a transaction in which the investor borrows stock, sells the stock, and later buys stock to repay the loan. Under present law, amounts paid by the taxpayer to the lender in lieu of dividends are deductible against ordinary income. A taxpayer can create short-term capital gain and ordinary loss by selling short before a dividend payment date and closing the short sale after the ex-dividend date in a transaction with essentially no economic consequences.

Under the bill, in the case of a short sale of stock, payments in lieu of dividends are not deductible unless the short sale is held open for at least 16 days. No deduction is allowed for payments in lieu of extraordinary dividends unless the short sale is held open for at least one year. Amounts disallowed are treated as part of the basis of the short seller in the stock acquired to close the short sale. Amounts not disallowed as a deduction are treated as interest for certain Code purposes. The provision applies with respect to short sales after the date of enactment.

5. Transactions in stock warrants

Present law is unclear as to the tax consequences of a corporation's dealing in its own warrants. Under present law, taxpayers with a gain may take the position that no gain is recognized and taxpayers with a loss may report the loss.

Under the bill, no gain or loss is recognized by a corporation on any transaction with respect to a warrant to buy or sell its own stock. The provision applies with respect to warrants acquired or lapsing after the date of enactment.

6. Companies that accumulate earnings

Under present law, a corporation may deduct 85 percent of the dividends it receives on portfolio stock investments. Furthermore, gain on the sale of stock held by an individual for more than one year is generally taxed as long-term capital gains at rates not in excess of 20 percent. As a result, if a widely-held investment company invests in dividend-paying stocks and pays no dividends, its shareholders could hold the stock for at least a year and then sell it at a price that reflects dividends received and retained by the company. Their gains would generally be long-term capital gain, so individual shareholders would essentially be recognizing dividend income at a tax rate substantially below 50 percent. The company may take the position that it is not subject to the accumulated earnings tax because it is widely held.

Under the bill, generally, widely held companies are not automatically excluded from the accumulated earnings tax. Also, the net capital loss deduction (including by carryover) is denied for mere investment or holding companies and amended, along with other provisions, for other companies. These provisions apply with respect to taxable years beginning after the date of enactment.

7. Distribution of debt by a corporation

Under present law, earnings and profits of a corporation are reduced by the principal amount of its obligations distributed to shareholders. Generally, for noncorporate shareholders, the amount of a distribution taken into account is the fair market value of the property distributed. A long-term obligation bearing little or no stated interest will have a fair market value well below its stated redemption price. The result may be to eliminate corporate earnings and profits at the cost of a relatively small dividend to shareholders.

The bill amends the earnings and profit rules to limit the reduction in earnings and profits resulting from the distribution of the corporation's own debt obligations. Also, under the bill, these obligations are subject to the original issue discount rules. These provisions apply with respect to distributions declared after March 15, 1984.

8. Phaseout of graduated rates for large corporations

Under present law, the first $100,000 of corporate taxable income is taxed at graduated rates. The taxable income in excess of $100,000 is taxed at the 46-percent rate. The graduated tax rates provide a tax reduction of $20,250 to corporations with taxable income in excess of $100,000 relative to a flat 46-percent tax.

The bill provides that the benefits of the graduated rates will effectively be phased out for any corporation with taxable income in excess of $1 million. An additional 5-percent tax, not to exceed $20,000 in amount, will be imposed on a corporation's taxable income in excess of $1 million. This provision will be effective for taxable years beginning after December 31, 1983.

9. Corporate tax preferences

The bill increases the present law corporate tax preference cutback from 15 percent to 20 percent, beginning in 1985.

10. Golden parachutes

Corporations fearing a hostile takeover attempt frequently enter into contracts with key personnel pursuant to which substantial payments will be made to such personnel in the event of a successful takeover. Under the bill, certain payments under such "golden parachute" contracts substantially in excess of historic compensation will be presumed not to be ordinary and necessary business expenses and not deductible. Furthermore a nondeductible 20-percent excise tax will be imposed on the recipient. The presumption will be rebuttable.

The provisions are effective with respect to payments under golden parachute contracts entered into after March 15, 1984.

11. Earnings and profits

Distributions from a corporation are generally treated as dividends only if they are paid out of current or accumulated earnings and profits. Under present law, a corporation's earnings and profits may be substantially less than its "true," or economic, income. This is because many of the tax rules applicable in determining taxable income are applicable to a greater or lesser extent in determining earnings and profits.

The bill makes a number of changes in the definition of earnings and profits in order to make it conform more closely to true or economic income. The bill also makes provision for the effect on earnings and profits of redemptions. With several exceptions, the provisions are effective for taxable years beginning after the date of enactment.

12. Net operating losses

Provisions from the Tax Reform Act of 1976 relating to special limitations on the carryover of net operating losses and other tax attributes are scheduled to become effective at varying times during 1984.

The bill delays the effective date of those provisions. As a result, the rules in effect prior to 1984 remain in effect.

13. "C" reorganizations

Present law contains no requirement that the transferor corporation distribute all its assets to shareholders in order for a transaction to qualify as a "C" reorganization. As a result, the transferor corporation can remain in existence, having transferred its tax attributes (particularly earnings and profits) to the acquiring corporation. Furthermore, the absence of a distribution requirement permits acquired corporations to avoid, to some extent, the rules of section 355.

The bill requires the transferor corporation to distribute all its assets to shareholders in order to qualify a transaction as a "C" reorganization. The Treasury is authorized to prescribe regulations providing relief from the rules in appropriate cases. The bill also requires an appropriate allocation of earnings and profits in certain "C" reorganizations. The provisions are effective for transactions pursuant to a plan adopted after the date of enactment.

14. "D" reorganizations

Under present law, the transfer of assets of a corporation to another corporation qualifies as a non-divisive "D" reorganization if, among other things, shareholders of the acquired corporation are in control of the acquiring corporation immediately after the transaction. Control is defined as ownership of at least 80 percent of the total combined voting power of all classes of stock entitled to vote and at least 80 percent of the total number of all other classes of stock.

The bill changes the control requirement to at least 50 percent. In addition, the bill provides that attribution rules are applicable in determining ownership. The provisions apply to transactions pursuant to a plan adopted after the date of enactment.

15. Collapsible corporations

In general, under present law, a collapsible corporation is one which is formed or availed of with a view (on the part of those in control of the corporation) to realize the value of the corporation's collapsible assets before the corporation has realized a "substantial part" of the taxable income to be derived from such property. Under the bill, the substantial part requirement would be defined to be "two-thirds" of the taxable income to be derived from the property.

The "70/30" rule of present law would be amended to authorize Treasury regulations specifying the extent to which all inventory assets be aggregated and treated as a single asset in determining whether the gain attributable to such assets should be treated as attributable to collapsible assets for purposes of the "70/30" rule.

The provisions are generally applicable to sales, exchanges, or distributions after December 31, 1984.

E. PARTNERSHIPS AND OTHER PASSTHROUGH ENTITIES

1. Allocations of partnership income or loss

a. Contributed property

Under present law, a partnership may elect to allocate gain or loss and depreciation or depletion with respect to contributed property to reflect variations between the basis of the property and its fair market value when contributed. In the absence of the election, it is possible that the gain or loss with respect to contributed property may be effectively shifted among members of the partnership.

Under the committee bill, the special allocation of gain or loss, depreciation, and depletion with respect to contributed property will be made mandatory. The provision applies to contributions made after March 31, 1984.

b. Partnership losses

Under present law, retroactive allocation of partnership deductions to partners entering late in the year is prohibited. Nonetheless, it may be possible to accomplish such an allocation through the use of tiered partnerships or, in the case of cash method partnerships, by delaying actual payment for accrued expenses.

With respect to the tiered partnership technique, the bill generally requires items of income, gain, loss, deduction and credit passing from a subsidiary partnership to a parent partnership to be allocated equally among the days in the parent's taxable year for which it has an interest in the subsidiary. Further, for cash basis partnerships, certain items such as taxes, interest, and rents are to be allocated proportionately over the periods to which they relate, so that a partner generally can be allocated only those items actually accrued while he is a partner. The bill also provides for a convention under which partners entering in any month may be treated as entering at the beginning of the month. The provision applies to items paid or accrued after March 31, 1984.

2. Conversion or deferral of income

a. Disguised payments

Under present law, amounts expended to organize or promote a partnership generally must be capitalized. Other payments for property or services may also be required to be capitalized. It has been suggested that these capitalization requirements may, in effect, be avoided when the payee is also a partner by allocating a greater share of income to that partner.

The bill provides that when a partner performs services for, or transfers property to, a partnership and receives a related allocation and distribution of partnership income or gain, the allocation and distribution, if properly so characterized, will be treated as a transaction occurring between the partnership and a person who is not a partner. The provision applies to services performed or property transferred after February 29, 1984.

b. Disguised sales

Under present law, a partner may be able to avoid recognition of gain on the sale of property to a partnership or another partner by characterizing the transaction as a contribution of the property followed by a distribution of cash or other property to the contributing partner.

The bill provides that, when properly so characterized, a transfer of property by a partner to a partnership and a related transfer to that or another partner will be treated as a sale between partners or between the partnership and one who is not a partner. The provision generally applies to transfers after March 31, 1984.

c. Gain or loss on contributed property

Present law provides that if certain ordinary income property of a partnership is distributed to a partner, its character as ordinary income property is preserved in the hands of the distributee for at least five years. No comparable rule applies to property contributed to a partnership. Thus, it may be possible to change the character of property from ordinary income to capital gain or from capital loss to ordinary loss through a contribution to a partnership.

Under the bill, the ordinary income or loss character of unrealized receivables contributed to a partnership will be preserved in the hands of the partnership. Further, the ordinary income or loss character of inventory items will be preserved in the hands of the partnership for five years. Built-in losses on capital assets contributed to a partnership are treated as capital losses if recognized by the partnership within 5 years. The provision applies with respect to property contributed after March 31, 1984.

d. Ordinary income property in tiered partnerships

Under present law, amounts received by a transferor partner in exchange for all or part of his partnership interest that are attributable to his interest in ordinary income assets of the partnership are treated as ordinary income. It has been argued that this rule can be avoided if ordinary income assets are held in a second partnership in which the distributing partnership holds an interest.

The bill treats a partnership that owns an interest in another partnership as owning its proportionate share of the ordinary income assets of such partnership directly. A similar rule applies to interests in trusts. The provision applies to distributions, sales or exchanges after March 31, 1984.

3. Transfers of partnership and trust interests by corporations

Under present law, when a partnership interest is sold, any gain is ordinary income to the extent attributable to certain ordinary income items of the partnership. When a corporation distributes property, or sells property in the course of certain complete liquidations, recapture income is taxed to the corporation while non-recapture gain attributable to appreciation in the transferred property goes unrecognized. It has been argued that the corporate recapture provisions do not apply to the distribution or liquidating sale of an interest in a partnership that holds recapture property.

Under the bill, a corporate distribution or a liquidating sale of a partnership interest is treated as a transfer of the distributing corporation's proportionate share of certain recapture items (and other corporate recognition property) held by the partnership. The provision also clarifies that a distribution is treated as a sale or exchange for purposes of the basis adjustment rules. The provision applies to distributions after March 31, 1984.

4. Like-kind exchanges of partnership interests; deferred like-kind exchanges

Under present law, like-kind exchanges of property held for productive use or investment are permitted to be made tax-free. These rules do not apply to inventory, stock, certificates of trust or beneficial interests, or other securities or evidences of indebtedness. In some cases, the courts have permitted tax-free like-kind exchanges of partnership interests. The Treasury has not acquiesced in these holdings. The bill provides that tax-free like-kind exchange treatment is not available for exchanges of interests in different partnerships. The provision applies with respect to transfers after the date of enactment.

Under present law, an intended like-kind exchange transaction may be held open for as long as five years under the case law. The bill provides that property which is received in an exchange and is either not designated at the time the taxpayer transfers his property or is received more than 180 days after the taxpayer transfers the relinquished property (or, if earlier, after the due date of the taxpayer's return), will not be treated as like-kind property. This provision will apply to transfers of property made after the date of enactment.

F. TRUST PROVISIONS

1. Trust distributions

Under present law, beneficiaries are taxed on the value of property distributed from a trust (or estate) to the extent of the trust's (or estate's) distributable net income. The trust (or estate) is allowed a deduction for amounts taxed to its beneficiaries. The basis of the property in the hands of the beneficiary is stepped up to its fair market value even though no tax is imposed on the unrealized appreciation.

Under the bill, distributions of property result in gain or loss to the trust or estate. Alternatively, the trustee or executor may elect to treat distributions of property as carrying out distributable net income only to the extent of the property's basis. The beneficiary's basis would be the same as the trust's (or estate's) and the appreciation would no longer be exempted from tax.

This provision applies to distributions from a trust (or estate) after March 1, 1984.

2. Multiple trusts

Treasury regulations prevent grantors of trusts from reducing present taxation by establishing multiple trusts for the same beneficiaries which take advantage of the separate graduated rates applicable to each trust. A recent court decision held these regulations to be invalid. The bill provides that trusts established by substantially the same grantors for substantially the same beneficiaries with a principal purpose of tax avoidance will be consolidated for tax purposes. This provision is generally effective for taxable years beginning after March 1, 1984.

G. TIME VALUE OF MONEY AND OTHER ACCOUNTING PROVISIONS

1. Deferred payment transactions

a. Time for inclusion or deduction of deferred interest

Present law provides that, in general, in a discount lending transaction, the borrower is treated as having paid, and the lender as having received, the annual unpaid interest, which is then relent to the borrower. These original issue discount (OID) rules match the interest inclusion by the lender with the interest deduction by the borrower. The OID rules of present law do not apply to obligations issued in exchange for property where neither the obligation nor the property is publicly traded; to obligations issued by individuals; or, as to holders of discount obligations, to obligations not held as capital assets.

The bill extends the OID rules to obligations issued for nontraded property, issued by individuals, and not held as capital assets. The interest element in obligations issued for nontraded property is to be compared to a test rate. The test (safe harbor) rate is 110 percent of an average yield on Federal obligations of similar maturity (the "applicable Federal rate"). This yield is to be redetermined semi-annually for 3 categories of maturities (short-, medium-, and long-term). If interest is not paid annually at least at this rate (or, if interest is stated at a higher rate, is not paid at least at that higher rate), interest is to be imputed at a rate equal to 120 percent of the applicable Federal rate (or at the higher stated rate) and annually included in the income of the lender and deducted by the borrower. Exceptions to these rules are provided for sales of principal residences, certain sales of farms, sales involving total payments of $250,000 or less, and issuers of obligations issued in a sale of assets not used by the purchaser in a trade or business or held by the purchaser for investment.

The bill also provides exceptions to the OID rules for loans of $10,000 or less between family members and for borrowers in negative amortization loan transactions where the loan proceeds are used to purchase non-business or non-investment property. These provisions generally apply to transactions entered into after December 31, 1984, except for sales or exchanges with respect to which there was a binding commitment on March 15, 1984.

b. Measurement of interest in deferred payment transactions

Under present law, if the parties to a deferred payment sale fail to state interest at a safe-harbor rate fixed by regulation, interest is imputed at a higher rate fixed by regulation. The safe-harbor rate is a simple interest rate; the imputed rate is a compound rate. Imputed interest is allocated among deferred payments in proportion to the amount of the payment, without regard to the period of time that has elapsed since the sale.

The bill provides that the adequacy of the interest element in a deferred payment sale is to be tested against a self-adjusting compound rate of interest which approximates a market rate. This test (safe-harbor) rate is the same rate applied under the proposed amendments to the OID rules: 110 percent of the applicable Federal rate. If insufficient interest is stated, interest is to be imputed at a rate equal to 120 percent of the applicable Federal rate. Interest income will be recognized by the lender and interest expense will be deducted by the borrower on an economic accrual basis when paid (in the case of a cash method taxpayer) or when due (in the case of an accrual method taxpayer). An exception is provided for purchasers of assets that do not constitute trade or business or investment assets in the hands of the purchaser.

The bill generally applies to sales or exchanges after December 31, 1984, except for sales or exchanges with respect to which there was a binding commitment on March 15, 1984. However, as to any transactions entered into after March 15, 1984, and before January 1, 1985, the bill provides that a deduction will not be allowed for interest in excess of the amount properly allocable to the period.

2. Deferred payments for use of property and services

Under present law, a lessor of property reporting income on the cash method includes rents from the property in income in the year in which the rent is actually or constructively received; an accrual method lessor reports rental income in the year in which all events fixing the lessee's liability for the rent have occurred and the amount thereof can be determined with reasonable accuracy (the "all-events test"). A cash method lessee otherwise entitled to deduct rent generally claims a deduction in the year the rent is paid; an accrual method lessee generally deducts rent in the year the all-events test is satisfied. An accrual basis lessor or lessee which is a party to a lease under which rents are not payable currently normally accrues a ratable portion of the rent income or expense in each year of the lease.

The bill requires that rental and interest income attributable to a deferred rental payment agreement be reported as income by the lessor and deducted by the lessee as if both were on the accrual method, irrespective of their actual methods of accounting. The provision will generally apply both in the case where payment of rent is deferred beyond the end of the taxable year subsequent to the year to which the rent relates and where rents are "stepped" (that is, increase or decrease over the term of the lease) more than is commercially reasonable. A stricter standard of commercial reasonableness applies to sale-leaseback transactions.

If a transaction is subject to these provisions, the amount of rent to be accrued by the parties for a taxable year will be based upon a rental rate that is constant or level for each period of the lease. In addition, the lessor will annually accrue interest income, and the lessee will deduct interest expense, at a rate equal to 120 percent of a self-adjusting statutory rate, on any unpaid accrued rent and interest.

Deferred payments under service contracts are treated in a manner similar to deferred rents, except that the annual inclusion and deduction rules apply only to the imputed interest element of the transaction.

Exceptions are provided for deferred payment transactions involving total payments of $250,000 or less and certain other situations.

The provisions are effective for agreements entered into after March 15, 1984, for taxable years ending after such date.

3. Premature accruals

Under the accrual method of accounting, an expense is deductible when all events have occurred which establish the fact of liability and the amount of the liability can be determined with reasonable accuracy. The proper time for deducting expenses for which economic performance has not yet occurred is the subject of controversy under present law.

The bill generally requires that economic performance must occur before all events establishing the fact of liability will be considered to have occurred. Exceptions are made for items for which specific timing rules are already provided under the Code, such as bad debts and vacation pay.

The bill permits utility companies owning nuclear power plants to take deductions for contributions to a segregated reserve fund dedicated to plant decommissioning, subject to certain limits. This reserve fund will be taxed as a separate entity, with respect to fund earnings, at the maximum corporate tax rate (46 percent).

The bill requires that all customer charges for decommissioning are to be included in the income of the company that is providing the services.

The bill also provides an elective method for deducting site reclamation and closing costs of surface and deep mines and solid, liquid, and hazardous waste disposal sites (not including superfund sites), associated with meeting the requirements of Federal or State law.

The bill also provides a 10-year carryback for losses arising from certain deferred liabilities and a longer period for certain losses associated with the decommissioning of nuclear generating plants.

The bill applies to expenses accruing after the date of enactment, subject to certain transition rules.

4. Prepayment of expenses

Except with respect to interest and prepayments by farm syndicates, present law is unclear as to the proper timing of a deduction for prepaid items by cash method taxpayers. In the case of interest, deductions are allowed only for the year to which the interest relates. A similar rule applies to prepaid expenses of farm syndicates.

The bill provides that farmers, other than farm syndicates, will not be allowed to deduct any amount paid for feed, seed, fertilizer or other supplies prior to the time such supplies are used or consumed if more than 50 percent of the expenses incurred in the trade or business of farming are prepaid. For other taxpayers (including farm syndicates), prepaid expenses will be treated as under present law. This rule will apply to prepayments made after the date of enactment.

5. Construction period interest and taxes for residential property

Under present law, taxpayers are generally required to capitalize construction period interest and taxes on real property other than low income housing. This rule does not apply to residential real property acquired, constructed or carried by a corporation (other than an S corporation).

The bill will require corporations to capitalize construction period interest and taxes for residential real property other than low income residential real property. This change will apply to interest and taxes paid or incurred in taxable years beginning after December 31, 1984, for construction of residential real property begun after March 15, 1984.

6. Pre-opening expenditures

Under present law, taxpayers may elect to amortize pre-opening or start-up expenditures over the first five years after the business is opened. If the election to amortize is not made, the IRS views these expenditures as nondeductible capital items. Certain taxpayers, nevertheless, claim those items as currently deductible if the five-year amortization election is not made.

The bill provides that pre-opening or start-up expenditures must be amortized over a five-year period. The provision is effective for taxable years beginning after June 30, 1984.

H. STRADDLES AND OTHER SECURITIES TRANSACTIONS

Under present law, several special rules apply to limit tax benefits from straddle transactions. Under the loss deferral rule, losses on straddles are deferred to the extent of gains on offsetting positions. However, there is an exception from this rule for straddles involving stock and stock options. Also, a mark-to-market system applies to regulated futures contracts under which taxes are paid on unrecognized gains and losses at the end of each year. Under the mark-to-market rules, gains and losses are treated as 60-percent long-term and 40-percent short-term, providing a maximum tax rate of 32 percent. The tax treatment of options on futures contracts and cash settlement options is unclear under present law.

The bill repeals the exception from the loss deferral rule for stock options and stock offset by an option, and substitutes a limited exception applying to covered calls which are not deep-in-the-money. The exception from the straddle rules for stock would not apply where the corporation is formed or availed of to enter into positions to offset the shareholder's own positions. When a taxpayer has written an in-the-money covered call, any long-term gain on the sale of the stock will be recharacterized as short-term to the extent of any short-term losses on the option.

The bill also extends the mark-to-market system to options on futures contracts (other than stock index futures contracts), to options where the underlying property is not equity based, and to options held by options market makers.

The bill modifies the hedging exception to the anti-straddle rules to reduce the possibility that it may be used to generate losses that shelter unrelated income from tax.

The Treasury Department's authority to issue regulations with regard to the straddles rules is extended so that it can deal with the problems presented under present law by mixed straddles. Its authority to prescribe effective identification requirements for the hedging exception and broker-dealer investment accounts is also broadened.

The wash-sale rule is extended to apply to short sales, including short sales "against the box."

The bill clarifies the treatment of cash settlement options.

The repeal of the exception for stock options from the anti-straddle rules is effective for positions entered into after October 31, 1983. The extension of mark-to-market rules is effective for positions entered into after the date of enactment. Transition rules are provided similar to those which were provided when the mark-to-market system for regulated futures contracts was implemented in 1981.

I. PENSIONS, WELFARE BENEFIT PLANS, ESOPS

1. General pension provisions

a. Deduction limits for qualified pension plans

Under present law, deduction limits are imposed on the amount of employer contributions to a qualified pension, profit-sharing, or stock bonus plan ("qualified pension plan"). If an employer maintains a pension plan and an annuity, profit-sharing, or stock bonus plan, the deduction for a year is limited to the greater of (1) 25 percent of aggregate compensation of all beneficiaries under the plan or (2) the amount necessary to satisfy the minimum funding requirement under the pension plan. In addition, present law provides overall limits on the contributions and benefits that may be provided to participants under qualified pension plans.

In the case of an employee participating both in a defined contribution plan and a defined benefit plan maintained by the same employer, the sum of the fractions of the separate limits for each plan is subject to an overall limit, which TEFRA generally reduced from 1.4 to 1.25. In addition, TEFRA suspended all cost-of-living adjustments to the dollar limits on contributions and benefits under qualified pension plans until 1986.

The bill applies the 25-percent limitation rule of present law to situations in which the employer maintains both a defined benefit pension plan and a money purchase pension plan for the same employees. In such a case, the deduction is limited to the greater of (1) 25 percent of compensation or (2) the minimum funding requirement under the defined benefit pension plan. Under the bill, in no event can an employer's deduction for contributions to all qualified pension plans of the employer exceed 100 percent of the aggregate compensation of all beneficiaries.

Under the bill, in the case of an employee participating in both a defined contribution plan and a defined benefit plan maintained by the same employer, the combined limit on the sum of the fractions of the separate limits is raised to 1.4, if no plan of the employer is top heavy or integrated with social security after June 30, 1982.

Finally, the bill postpones the cost-of-living increases to the dollar limits on contributions and benefits under qualified pension plans until 1988. Beginning in 1988, the limits will be adjusted for post-1986 cost-of-living increases under the formula then in effect to provide cost-of-living increases in social security benefits.

The provisions are effective for years beginning after December 31, 1984.

b. Provisions relating to top-heavy plans

Under present law, if a qualified pension plan is top heavy, certain minimum requirements must be met. These requirements include rules relating to the provision of minimum benefits or contributions to non-key employees. If a plan is top heavy, the combined limit on contributions and benefits for a key employee participating in both a defined contribution plan and a defined benefit plan is reduced to 1.0, unless additional minimum benefits or contributions are provided to non-key employee. In the case of a super top-heavy plan, the 1.0 combined limit cannot be avoided by providing additional minimum benefits or contributions.

Under the bill, the special limit for super top-heavy plans is repealed. The definition of a key employee is amended to exclude officers who earn less than twice the dollar limit on annual additions under a defined contribution plan. The accrued benefit of any individual is disregarded after the individual has been separated from service for 5 years. Under the bill, employer contributions made pursuant to a salary reduction arrangement are counted for purposes of the top-heavy plan rules. The bill exempts governmental plans from the top-heavy plan rules. In addition, a simplified amendment provision applies if the Secretary fails to issue final regulations with respect to the top-heavy requirements by January 1, 1985.

The provisions generally are effective for plan years beginning after December 31, 1983. The rules relating to separated employees and salary reduction arrangements are effective for plan years beginning after December 31, 1984.

c. Distribution rules for qualified pension plans

Present law requires that distributions to an individual under a qualified pension plan prior to age 59½ are subject to an additional 10-percent income tax to the extent that the amounts are attributable to years in which the individual was a key employee in a top-heavy plan. In addition, present law requires that distributions to a key employee in a top-heavy plan commence no later than age 70½ without regard to whether the key employee has retired.

Under present law, in the case of a qualified pension plan or an IRA, after the death of the participant and the participant's surviving spouse, any distributions to beneficiaries must be made within 5 years after the death of the participant or surviving spouse.

Under present law, if the balance to the credit of an employee is paid as a qualifying rollover distribution, all or any portion of the distribution may be rolled over, within 60 days of the date of the distribution, to another qualified pension or annuity plan or an IRA. No rollover is permitted for a plan distribution that is not a total distribution.

Under the bill, the additional 10-percent income tax applies to amounts attributable to years in which the individual was a 5-percent owner of the employer without regard to whether the plan was top heavy. Rollovers to IRAs of certain partial distributions under a qualified pension plan are permitted. In addition, the bill applies the rules that distributions must commence at age 70½ to all 5-percent owners of the employer.

The bill changes the after-death distribution rules to provide that the 5-year rule is satisfied under a qualified pension plan or an IRA if (1) an immediate annuity contract is distributed to the beneficiary or (2) an annuity is paid from or under a defined benefit pension plan.

The provisions generally are effective for plan years beginning after December 31, 1984.

d. Treatment of distributions of benefits substantially all of which are derived from employee contributions

Under present law, an employee-contribution only plan may be a qualified pension plan. In addition, nondeductible employee contributions to a qualified pension plan may be withdrawn at any time without penalty. The first withdrawals of nondeductible contributions are treated as a return of nondeductible contributions, which are not includible in gross income.

Under the bill, in the case of a plan in which substantially all of the accrued benefits are derived from employee contributions, the first amounts withdrawn from the plan are treated as coming out of earnings in the employee's account. In addition, if an employee receives a loan (directly or indirectly) under the plan, the bill treats the amount of the loan as a distribution under the plan.

The provision is effective for any withdrawals occurring, or loans made, more than 90 days after the date of enactment

e. Repeal of estate tax exclusion for qualified pension plan benefits

TEFRA reduced the estate tax exclusion for certain benefits under qualified pension plans and IRAs to $100,000, for decedents dying after December 31, 1982.

Under the bill, the separate estate tax exclusion for retirement benefits is repealed, effective for decedents dying after December 31, 1984. A grandfather rule is provided for this provision and for the TEFRA change with respect to certain participants whose benefits were in pay status as of the effective date of either provision.

f. Affiliated service groups, employee leasing arrangements, and collective bargaining agreements

Under present law, certain aggregation rules apply to treat employees of related employers as if employed by a single employer. In addition, under certain circumstances, a leased employee is treated as the employee of the lessee. Present law provides that many of the nondiscrimination rules do not apply to a plan maintained pursuant to a collective bargaining agreement.

Under the bill, modifications are made to the rules for affiliated service groups, employee leasing arrangements, and collectively bargained plans maintained primarily for management employees.

The modification to the rules for affiliated service groups is effective for plan years beginning after December 31, 1984. The employee leasing provision is effective for plan years beginning after December 31, 1983. The collective bargaining agreement provision is effective on April 1, 1984.

2. Welfare benefit plans

a. Additional requirements for tax-exempt status of certain organizations

Under the bill, an organization generally will not qualify as a tax-exempt voluntary employees' beneficiary association (VEBA), a supplemental unemployment compensation benefit trust (SUB), or a group legal service organization for a year unless the plan of which it is a part meets requirements relating to the proportion of benefits provided to certain key employees. In addition, an organization will not be tax-exempt as a VEBA, SUB, or group legal service organization unless the plan of which it is a part meets new, more effective, standards prohibiting discrimination in favor of employees who are highly compensated. These additional requirements apply for taxable years beginning after 1984.

b. Excise taxes involving funded welfare benefit funds

Under the bill, if the use of certain facilities is provided under a funded welfare benefit plan, a nondeductible excise tax is imposed on the use of the facilities by certain key employees under specified circumstances. The bill also imposes nondeductible excise taxes on employers with respect to certain facilities and with respect to excess reserve amounts under a funded, top-heavy welfare benefit plan. The provision applies to years beginning after 1984.

c. Tax with respect to other benefits of key employees

Under the bill, if certain key employees are provided more than 25 percent of the use of certain facilities or if a welfare benefit fund is top heavy for a year, then benefits with respect to certain key employees for the year are subject to a 50 percent excise tax. The provision applies for taxable years beginning after 1984.

d. Treatment of certain medical, etc., benefits under section 415

Present law limits contributions and benefits under qualified pension, profit-sharing, and stock bonus plans. Medical benefits provided under a qualified pension plan are not taken into account in applying the limits. Under the bill, in the case of a top-heavy qualified pension plan, medical benefits are to be taken into account with respect to any participant who has an individual medical benefit account. A plan would be required to maintain such an account for each key employee beginning with the first year in which it is top heavy. The provision applies to years beginning after March 31, 1984.

e. Employee and welfare benefit fund treated as related persons

Under present law, the gain from the sale of depreciable property between certain related taxpayers is treated as ordinary income but an employer and a welfare benefit fund to which the employer contributes generally are not treated as related parties. The bill treats an employer and a welfare benefit fund as related parties if the employer controls the fund directly or indirectly. The provision applies to sales and exchanges after the date of enactment, in taxable years ending after that date.

3. Retirement savings incentives

Individual retirement accounts for one-earner couples

Under present law, an individual generally is entitled to deduct IRA contributions up to the lesser of $2,000 or 100 percent of compensation. The $2,000 deduction limit is increased to $2,250 for any year in which (1) at least $250 is contributed to an IRA for the spouse of the individual and (2) the spouse has no compensation for the year. Under certain circumstances, alimony may be considered compensation for purposes of the IRA deduction limits.

Under the bill, the dollar amount of the IRA deduction limit for a married couple is increased to $4,000 as follows: (1) for taxable years beginning in 1985 and 1986, $2,750, (2) for taxable years beginning in 1987 and 1988, $3,250, (3) for taxable years beginning in 1989 and 1990, $3,750, and (4) for taxable years beginning in 1991 and thereafter, $4,000. In addition, the bill repeals the special rules for alimony and treats all alimony received as compensation for purposes of the IRA deduction limit.

The provisions are effective for taxable years beginning after December 31, 1984.

4. Employee stock ownership provisions

Under present law, the limit on the tax credit for employer contributions to an employee stock ownership plan (ESOP) is scheduled to increase from one-half of one percent of payroll in 1983 and 1984 to three-fourths of one percent in 1985. The bill freezes the limit at the current rate through 1985.

The bill provides a number of incentives for employee stock ownership. First, it permits a tax-free rollover of the proceeds from the sale of a business to an ESOP or to certain worker-owned cooperatives, provided the proceeds are reinvested in the securities of another business. Second, a corporate deduction is allowed for dividends paid on ESOP stock, provided the dividends are paid out currently to employees or used to repay an ESOP loan. Third, a bank, insurance company, or other commercial lender is permitted an exclusion from income for 50 percent of the interest received on loans to ESOP companies, provided the loan proceeds are used to finance an ESOP's acquisition of company stock. Fourth, the capital gain exclusion is increased from 60 to 80 percent for investments in certain companies with employee ownership.

The bill also provides that the liability for estate taxes may be assumed by an ESOP in return for a transfer from the estate of stock of an equal value, provided the company sponsoring the ESOP guarantees payment of the taxes. In addition, an exclusion from the gross estate is allowed for 50 percent of the proceeds realized on the sale of employer securities to an ESOP or to certain worker-owned cooperatives. Also, for income, gift and estate tax purposes, an ESOP is treated as a charitable organization, provided donated stock is not allocated to the donor, family members of the donor or 25-percent or more shareholders.

The provisions are effective for years beginning after December 31, 1984.

5. Miscellaneous pension provisions

a. Elimination of retroactive application of amendments made by Multiemployer Pension Plan Amendments Act of 1980

The Multiemployer Pension Plan Amendments Act of 1980 (MPPAA) was enacted on September 26, 1980. That Act generally imposes liability on an employer who withdraws from a multiemployer defined benefit pension plan on or after April 28, 1980.

Under the bill, an employer does not have withdrawal liability under the MPPAA as a result of a withdrawal from a multiemployer plan before September 26, 1980. In addition, withdrawal liability does not apply to a withdrawal completed before December 31, 1980, pursuant to a binding agreement in effect on September 26, 1980. Employers are entitled to a refund of amounts collected. The provision is effective on the date of enactment.

b. Treatment of certain distributions from a qualified terminated plan

Under present law, a distribution under a qualified pension plan is not a lump sum distribution eligible for rollover to an IRA unless it consists of the balance to the credit of the employee and is made within one taxable year of the recipient.

Under the bill, special relief is provided for certain pension plan distributions received by a taxpayer during 1976 and 1977 so that the amounts received are treated as a lump sum distribution eligible for rollover. In addition, the usual statute of limitations period is extended. The provision is effective upon date of enactment.

c. Special rule for Trans-Alaskan pipeline employees

Under present law, in the case of the partial termination of a qualified pension plan, the rights of all affected employees to benefits accrued to the date of the partial termination generally become nonforfeitable upon the partial termination to the extent those benefits have been funded.

Under the bill, in the case of certain multiemployer pension plans located in the state of Alaska, no partial termination is deemed to have occurred merely because there was a reduction in workforce upon completion of the Trans-Alaskan pipeline. The provision is effective on the date of enactment.

d. Distribution requirements for accounts and annuities of an insurer in rehabilitation proceedings

Under present law, distributions to the owner of an IRA must be made by the end of the taxable year in which the owner attains 70½. In addition, after the death of the owner, distributions must be made to beneficiaries within 5 years of death of the owner. In the event that distributions are not made as required under present law, an excise tax of 50 percent applies to the amounts that are required to be distributed.

Under the bill, an amount is not required to be distributed under the usual rules for IRAs to the extent that the amounts are held by an insurance company that, on March 15, 1984, is engaged in rehabilitation proceedings under applicable State law. The provision is effective on March 15, 1984.

e. Extension of time for repayment of qualified refunding loans

TEFRA imposed limits on the extent to which an individual can borrow amounts from a qualified pension plan without the loan being treated as a distribution under the plan. A transition rule was provided for certain "qualified refunding loans" made on or after August 13, 1982, and repaid before August 14, 1983.

Under the bill, the period for making and repaying qualified refunding loans is extended to January 1, 1985, for qualified refunding loans of non-key employees. The provision is effective as if enacted in TEFRA.

f. Pension portability involving telecommunications divestiture

Under present law, generally all years of service with the employer maintaining a qualified pension plan must be taken into account for purposes of the minimum participation and vesting requirements. In any case in which an employer maintains a plan of a predecessor employer, service for the predecessor is treated as service for the employer.

Under the provision, the period of service of a qualified employee (an employee of AT&T or any of its subsidiaries immediately before divestiture) with any of the companies after divestiture includes service with any of the other companies whether or not that service was performed before divestiture, under the rules in effect for 1984. Accordingly, the rules provided by the court order for 1985, under which post-divestiture service with another divested company would not be taken into account, will not be effective.

J. FOREIGN PROVISIONS

1. Factoring trade receivables

Under present law, a seller who sells goods for the buyer's receivable (a transferable debt) may sell that receivable to a third party—a factor—at a discount. If a U.S.-owned factor is in a tax haven, it may earn income free of U.S. tax. That income may be eligible for deferral, and it may be foreign-source income that is sheltered by excess foreign tax credits. Further, when a foreign subsidiary of a U.S. corporation invests in U.S. property, that investment is taxable as a dividend to the U.S. parent. Some taxpayers allege that this rule does not apply to a foreign factoring subsidiary that buys receivables from its U.S. parent.

Under the bill, when a foreign factoring subsidiary of a U.S. owner gets cash for a receivable that (1) it bought from a related person, and (2) the related person had taken in exchange for inventory, the U.S. owner is taxed on that factoring income. The bill treats income from a related U.S. person's receivables as U.S.-source income except for income from export receivables which is treated as 50 percent U.S. source and 50 percent foreign source. The bill also treats payments of cash from a foreign subsidiary to a related U.S. person for receivables (except for export receivables) arising from the U.S. person's sales of inventory, as investments in U.S. property. Thus, payments of cash for receivables will be taxable as dividends to the U.S. parent. Export receivables will not include receivables attributable to sales involving a DISC or FSC. This provision will apply to accounts receivable and evidences of indebtedness transferred after March 1, 1984 in taxable years ending after that date.

2. Certain transfers of appreciated property to foreign corporations

Under present law, certain transfers of appreciated assets to foreign corporations in reorganizations and liquidations, which would be tax-free, are taxable if the Internal Revenue Service rules that one of the principal purposes of the transfers was the avoidance of Federal income tax. Under Internal Revenue Service guidelines, generally, transfers of property used in the active conduct of a foreign trade or business are not taxed. However, also under those guidelines, transfers of assets containing built-in gain (such as inventory and accounts receivable) are generally taxed.

Judicial interpretation of the principal purpose test has reduced the ability of the Internal Revenue Service to administer these rules. In addition, the Internal Revenue Service's current ruling policy permits the tax-free transfer of intangible property abroad, where the development of the property generated significant U.S. tax benefits but the income derived from the property may escape U.S. taxation. Finally, the courts have rejected the Internal Revenue Service's requirement that certain losses be recaptured upon the incorporation of a foreign branch by a U.S. person.

Under the bill, the rules governing transfers of appreciated property abroad are amended to provide for gain recognition without regard to purpose, unless the property is transferred for use in an active trade or business abroad. Certain transfers of assets containing built-in gain are automatically subject to tax. Transfers of stock are subject to the active trade or business test. In addition, transfers of intangibles that would otherwise be tax-free are subject to tax. The intangibles rule does not apply to good will or going concern value developed by a foreign branch. Finally, the current Internal Revenue Service policy on incorporations of foreign branches is codified. The provision generally applies to transfers after January 1, 1985.

3. Decontrol of foreign corporations

Under present law, when a U.S. taxpayer who is a 10-percent shareholder of a controlled foreign corporation sells or exchanges stock in a taxable transaction, the gain is treated as ordinary (dividend) income to the extent of the shareholder's pro rata share of the corporation's post-1962 accumulated earnings and profits. A U.S. corporation that disposes of stock by distributing it as a dividend-in-kind or in the course of liquidation, in a transaction otherwise eligible for nonrecognition treatment to the U.S. corporation, is also required to include in income its share of post-1962 accumulated earnings and profits. Taxpayers have taken the position that this rule does not apply if a controlled foreign corporation that is wholly owned by a U.S. corporation issues new shares for shares of the U.S. corporation. If this position were sustained, such a transaction could lead to permanent exemption from U.S. corporate tax of the earnings of the controlled foreign corporation accumulated prior to the exchange.

Under the bill, certain exchanges by a controlled foreign corporation of its newly issued stock for shares of its U.S. parent corporation are treated as sales or exchanges by the U.S. parent of stock in the controlled foreign corporation. The provision applies as of the date of enactment.

4. Foreign investors—original issue discount and coupon stripping

Foreign investors acquiring pure original issue discount corporate bonds—those with no payment of interest until maturity—defer U.S. taxation until they surrender the bonds at maturity. The rules governing timing of income inclusion for foreign investors holding corporate OID debt differ in some respects from those governing income inclusion for U.S. investors. As for foreign holders of debt originally issued at a discount by obligors other than corporations and governmental entities, existing law is unclear.

The bill conforms the timing of income inclusions for foreign investors to the timing for comparable U.S. investors, except that there is no inclusion for foreign investors until actual receipt of payment. The bill also conforms the treatment of noncorporate debt to the treatment of corporate debt. These provisions generally apply to payments made on or after the 60th day after the date of enactment.

The Internal Revenue Code does not contain specific rules governing foreign investors who sell or surrender stripped bonds or who sell stripped coupons. The bill generally conforms the rules governing foreign investors to those governing U.S. investors, except that there is no inclusion for foreign investors until actual receipt of payment. Thus, foreign investors will treat stripped coupons and stripped bonds as being OID instruments. These provisions will apply generally to payments made on or after the 60th day after enactment.

5. Recharacterization of U.S. income as foreign income

Under present law, the United States taxes the U.S. income of U.S. taxpayers. U.S. taxpayers' foreign income can be free of U.S. tax under the foreign tax credit. U.S. taxpayers can place the "foreign" label on some U.S. income (such as interest and insurance premiums) by routing it through a foreign corporation. This foreign corporation distributes foreign dividends to its U.S. owners. This newly foreign income may escape U.S. (and foreign) tax.

The bill prevents re-labelling of U.S. income as foreign income. Under the bill, if a corporation, 10 percent (or more) of whose gross income is U.S. income (including U.S. business income), pays interest or dividends to a U.S. taxpayer, a pro rata portion of the payment is U.S. income. The bill applies only to 50-percent U.S-owned corporations. Generally, it applies with respect to income earned by paying corporations after the date of enactment. Transitional rules are provided.

6. Recharacterization of interest income as dividend income

Under present law, a U.S. taxpayer's foreign interest income cannot escape both U.S. and foreign tax (under the United States' separate foreign tax credit limitation that prevents foreign taxes on non-interest income from offsetting U.S. tax on foreign interest income). U.S. taxpayers can circumvent this rule by creating foreign subsidiaries to earn foreign interest income (for example, by depositing money in foreign banks). When the U.S. taxpayer is taxable on the earnings of its foreign subsidiary, its income is dividend income, not interest income. Thus, newly recharacterized "non-interest" income may totally escape both U.S. and foreign tax.

The bill treats foreign dividends as interest to the extent that the paying corporation's earnings and profits arise from interest. This rule applies only if 10 percent or more of the paying corporation's earnings and profits for a base period (generally the three taxable years preceding the taxable year in which the dividend is paid) arise from interest. The provision generally applies to income earned by paying corporations in taxable years beginning after the date of enactment. Transitional rules are provided.

7. Source of transportation income

Under present law, in general, the United States taxes all U.S. income, but not all foreign income, of United States persons. In general, the United States does not tax the foreign income of foreign persons (such as foreign corporations). Under present law, transportation income can be almost all foreign even if the transportation is between two U.S. points, if the route of transport lies primarily outside the United States' three mile territorial limit.

Under the bill, income earned from transportation that begins and ends in the United States (or U.S. possessions) is treated as U.S. income. Income earned from transportation includes services income and leasing income from ships, airplanes, and containers used in connection with ships and airplanes. The effective date is the date of enactment.

8. Foreign collapsible corporations

Under present law, sales of inventory yield ordinary income, not capital gain. "Collapsible" corporations' assets generally include inventory. Generally, a shareholder's gain on the sale or liquidation of a collapsible corporation is ordinary income rather than capital gain. However, if a collapsible corporation consents under section 341(f) to recognize ordinary income on disposition of its inventory and the like, the shareholder gets capital gain treatment on the sale or liquidation of the corporation. In the case of a consenting foreign corporation, enforcement of the consent may be impractical.

Under the bill, in general, a section 341(f) consent given by a foreign corporation is not given effect to the extent provided in regulations. This provision is effective for sales or exchanges after the date of enactment.

9. Insurance of related parties by a controlled foreign corporation

Under present law, income that a controlled foreign corporation earns from insuring U.S. risks is currently taxable to its U.S. shareholders; income earned from insuring non-U.S. risks of a related party may not be currently taxable. The bill provides that, for purposes of determining foreign base company services income (which is also currently taxable to U.S. shareholders of a controlled foreign corporation), any services performed with respect to any policy of insurance or reinsurance covering risks of a related party will be treated as having been performed in the country in which the insured risk is located. This provision will apply to taxable years of foreign corporations beginning after the date of enactment.

10. Excise tax on insurance premiums paid to foreign insurers and reinsurers

Generally, present law imposes an excise tax on premium payments for the direct insurance or reinsurance of U.S. risks with foreign insurers or reinsurers. The bill conforms the tax rate on reinsurance to that imposed on direct insurance depending on the character of the U.S. risk covered, but imposes an excise tax only once—on retained premiums received by foreign insurers or reinsurers—when the U.S. risk is insured or reinsured outside the U.S. The excise tax on the insurance or reinsurance of U.S. casualty risks by a foreign insurer will be four percent of premiums paid; for U.S. life, accident or health, or annuity risks, the excise tax will be one percent of the premiums paid. In addition, the bill adopts a withholding provision for the excise tax. This provision will apply generally to premium payments made after the date of enactment.

11. Withholding on dispositions by foreigners of United States real property interests

Under the Foreign Investment in Real Property Tax Act of 1980, foreign persons who dispose of U.S. real property interests generally are required to pay tax on any gain realized on the disposition. The Act provides for enforcement of the tax on foreign persons through a system of information reporting designed to identify foreign owners of U.S. real property interests.

The bill generally allows replacement of the information reporting system with a withholding system. Generally, the bill requires withholding of a certain portion of the sales price by a transferee of U.S. real estate, any agent of a transferee, or any settlement officer or transferor's agent (hereinafter collectively referred to as the withholding agent) where U.S. real estate is acquired from a foreign person. Withholding generally is required only if the withholding agent knows (or has received notice from the transferor or his agent) that the transferor is a foreign person. The bill provides for exemptions from withholding in certain cases including that in which the transferee is to use the real property as his principal residence and the purchase price is $200,000 or less. This provision will be effective for payments with respect to dispositions made more than 30 days after the date of enactment.

12. Provisions relating to foreign personal holding companies

The bill clarifies the family and partner attribution rules for determining when a foreign corporation is a foreign personal holding company. It also prevents avoidance of U.S. tax by interposition of a foreign trust or another foreign entity between a foreign personal holding company and a U.S. taxpayer. In addition, the bill coordinates the foreign personal holding company rules with the controlled foreign corporation rules. It provides that shareholders of a controlled foreign corporation (that is also a foreign personal holding company) are subject to the controlled foreign corporation rules to the extent that income taxable under those rules exceeds income taxable under the foreign personal holding company rules. These provisions generally apply to taxable years beginning after the date of enactment.

13. Foreign investment companies

Under present law, taxpayers contend that a foreign corporation that is widely held by U.S. persons may establish a subsidiary to invest in U.S. commodities markets without any of the parties incurring U.S. tax. They also contend that when the U.S. shareholders eventually dispose of their shares in the foreign corporation they will be subject to tax at only the capital gains rate.

The bill will, in certain cases, apply the accumulated earnings tax to earnings from U.S. investments, even after those earnings pass through corporate solution as dividends or interest. This provision applies generally to distributions received on or after May 23, 1983. It will also generally treat gains of U.S. shareholders from those investments as ordinary income. This provision applies generally to sales or exchanges on or after October 31, 1983.

14. Repeal of 30-percent withholding tax on certain interest paid to foreign persons

Under present law, a U.S. tax of 30 percent is generally imposed on the gross amount of U.S. source annuities, interest, dividends, rents, royalties, and similar payments to foreign persons if the payments are not effectively connected with a U.S. trade or business conducted by the foreign person. Exemptions from the tax are provided in certain situations. The tax is generally withheld by the payor. In addition, U.S. tax treaties generally reduce or eliminate the tax on interest paid to treaty country residents.

The bill provides for a phase-out of the 30-percent tax on interest paid on portfolio indebtedness by U.S. borrowers to nonresident alien individuals and foreign corporations. The rate of tax will be reduced to five percent for interest received after the date of enactment. The rate of tax will be reduced to four percent in 1985, three percent in 1986, two percent in 1987, and one percent for the period January 1 to June 30, 1988. Effective July 1, 1988, the withholding tax on interest received by nonresident alien individuals and foreign corporations on portfolio indebtedness will be repealed. However, the 30 percent tax on such interest will be retained in certain cases where the foreign person is related to the U.S. obligor, where the foreign person is controlled by U.S. persons, or where the foreign person is a bank.

15. Extension of moratorium on application of research and experimental expense allocation regulation

In determining foreign-source taxable income for purposes of computing the foreign tax credit limitation, taxpayers must allocate or apportion expenses between foreign-source income and U.S.-source income (Code secs. 861-863). Rules for allocating and apportioning research and other expenses are set forth in Treasury Regulation sec. 1.861-8.

In the Economic Recovery Tax Act of 1981 (ERTA), Congress directed the Treasury Department to study the impact of its section 861 regulations on research activities conducted in the United States and on the availability of the foreign tax credit. Congress also provided that for a taxpayer's first two taxable years beginning after the date of enactment of ERTA (August 13, 1981), all research expenditures in those years for research activities conducted in the United States are to be allocated or apportioned to sources within the United States. This two-year moratorium on the application of the research and experimental expense allocation rules of Treas. Reg. sec. 1.861-8 does not apply to subsequent taxable years.

The bill generally extends for two more years the moratorium on the application of the Treasury research expense allocation rules. The extension is effective on the date of enactment.

K. TAXPAYER COMPLIANCE AND TAX ADMINISTRATION PROVISIONS

1. Syndicate promoters

Present law does not provide the Treasury with the means of detecting and tracing tax shelter promotions through the activities of the promoters.

The bill provides for registration of tax shelter promotions with the IRS so that the IRS can more effectively manage its activities with respect to tax shelters. Also, the bill requires promoters to keep a list of their investors for inspection by the IRS.

2. Cash and mortgage interest reporting

Present law provides for reporting of cash transactions by certain financial institutions, but does not require nonfinancial institutions to report receipts of cash from individuals. Similarly, present law does not require reporting by recipients of amounts that may be deducted by the payor.

The bill requires persons who, in connection with their trade or business, receive cash payments from another person in excess of $10,000, or mortgage interest payments in excess of $2,300 annually, to report those payments to the IRS.

3. Foreclosure reporting

Under present law, foreclosures in satisfaction of a debt or forgiveness of a debt may give rise to income to the debtor. The bill requires persons lending in the course of a trade or business to report to the IRS when the security for a loan is acquired by foreclosure or otherwise in satisfaction of all or part of the debt. Reporting is also required when the borrower abandons the security or the lender claims a bad debt deduction.

4. Promoter penalty

The Tax Equity and Fiscal Responsibility Act of 1982 provides for a penalty on promoters and salespersons of abusive tax shelters equal to the greater of $1,000 or 10 percent of gross income to be derived from the activity. The bill increases the penalty to the greater of $2,000 or 20 percent of gross income. The bill also makes actions incidental to the activities of a tax shelter subject to penalty and injunction.

5. Interest for tax shelter cases

The bill provides a special, higher interest rate in pre-1983 tax shelter cases for interest accruing after 1983.

6. Reporting of State income tax refunds

Present law requires States to report refunds of State or local income tax to the IRS and to provide the individual taxpayer with a copy of the report during January of the year following the year of refund. The bill alternatively permits the State to furnish the statement to the taxpayer at the same time that payment of a refund is made.

7. Regulation of appraisers

Present law allows the Treasury to regulate the practice of attorneys and accountants who appear before the Treasury. No comparable authority exists with respect to appraisers. The bill provides authority for the Treasury to bar disreputable appraisers from practice before the Treasury.

8. IRA reporting

Present law generally allows an individual to deduct the amount of qualified individual retirement account (IRA) contributions made for a year, either during the year or before the due date (with extensions) of the income tax return for the year. In the absence of reporting specifically by the trustee or issuer, the Internal Revenue Service has difficulty verifying whether contributions were made and the proper year to which they relate. The bill clarifies the authority of the Treasury Department to require reporting on contributions to IRAs by the trustee or issuer. Reports are to include the amount and the year to which a contribution relates. The bill also provides that an IRA contribution is not deductible for any year unless made on or before the unextended due date of the return for that year.

9. Short-sale compliance

A broker who holds securities for a customer in a street name may lend those securities to another for use in a short-sale. If dividends or interest are paid on the securities before the stock is returned to the broker, the short-seller will make substitute payments to the broker. These payments are not eligible for the dividends received deduction or any otherwise applicable interest exclusion. The bill requires brokers to notify their customers when payments they receive are amounts in lieu of dividends or tax-exempt interest occurring by reason of a short-sale. Regulatory authority will permit the Treasury to extend these rules to other transactions when appropriate. This provision applies to payments in lieu of dividends or tax-exempt interest made after December 31, 1984.

10. Charitable contribution and other valuation rules

The bill imposes a number of substantiation rules and sanctions (relating to appraisals and information reporting) in the case of charitable contributions of property other than publicly traded securities, effective for post-1984 contributions.

Also, the bill provides certain disallowance sanctions for overvaluations claimed for certain charitable contributions. If the value claimed on the return is between 150 and 175 percent of the correct value (i.e., as determined by a court or settlement agreement), the donor's deduction cannot exceed basis plus one-half of the appreciation otherwise deductible; if between 175 and 200 percent, the deduction cannot exceed the donor's basis; if 200 percent or more, the donor cannot deduct either basis or appreciation. The bill also modifies the present-law penalty with respect to incorrect valuations generally, including deletion of the exception for property held for more than five years, and extension of the penalty to incorrect estate and gift tax valuations. The overvaluation disallowance and penalty rules apply with respect to returns filed after 1984.

11. Disclosure of tax return information

The bill modifies the present law disclosure rules to permit exchanges of tax return information between the IRS and cities with a population of over 2 million individuals that have income or wage taxes.

12. Changes in accounting methods

The bill precludes a taxpayer from asserting that the IRS has not consented to a change in accounting method as a defense to any penalty unless the taxpayer has requested permission to change methods.

13. Interest on penalties

The bill provides that interest shall be charged on the penalties for failure to file, valuation overstatement, and substantial understatement of tax as if the penalties were assessed on the due date of the return (with extensions).

14. Tax deposits

The bill requires taxpayers required to deposit more than once a month to make any deposit of $20,000 or more on or before the due date of the deposit. They may no longer treat deposits mailed two days in advance of the due date as timely made.

15. Tax litigation

The bill increases the present law $5,000 limit on small tax case proceedings to $10,000. The present law penalty (expanded in 1982) for maintaining dilatory Tax Court actions is made applicable to all cases pending 120 days after enactment. Title 18 is amended to provide for appropriate, even single, venue of multi-party criminal tax litigation.

16. False withholding certificates

Language in the criminal penalty with respect to false withholding information which provides that no other penalty may apply is eliminated.

17. Backup withholding

The bill provides that, with respect to backup withholding, the Secretary's authority to require that a payee certify under penalties of perjury that his taxpayer identification number is correct is limited to interest, dividends, patronage dividends, and amounts subject to broker reporting.

18. Tax shelter study

The bill provides for a study by the Treasury Department of certain aspects of tax shelters to be submitted to the Congress by December 1, 1984.

L. DEPRECIATION

1. Real estate depreciation

Under present law, real estate can generally be depreciated, on an accelerated basis, over 15 years. The bill provides that new and used real property, other than low-income housing, is to be depreciated over not less than 20 years.

Subject to a transitional rule, the provision is applicable with respect to property placed in service by a taxpayer after March 15, 1984.

2. Depreciation recapture and installment sales

Under present law, the installment sale rules override the depreciation recapture rules applicable to real estate. Generally, no real estate depreciation recapture income is recognized in an installment sale until the taxpayer receives installment obligation payments. Under the bill, all such depreciation recapture income realized is to be recognized at the time of the installment sale. Gross profit, under the installment sale rules, is to be adjusted by reason of such income.

Subject to a transitional rule, the provision applies to installment sales after March 15, 1984.

3. Movies and sound recordings

Under present law, it is unclear whether movies qualify as recovery property. Furthermore, taxpayers have taken the position that movies can be depreciated on the income forecast method and still be eligible for a 10-percent investment credit. Under the bill, movies cannot qualify as recovery property and are eligible for the investment credit only under the special investment credit rules applicable to certain movies.

Subject to a transitional rule, the provisions are effective as of the effective date of the rules defining recovery property (sec. 168).

Under present law, it is unclear whether sound recordings qualify as tangible personal property for depreciation and investment credit purposes. The bill provides that any sound recording may, by election, be treated as 3-year property and eligible for a 6-percent investment credit or, if the taxpayer fails to so elect, depreciated under the income forecast method with no investment credit. Special rules are provided for contingent amounts, foreign production costs, and certain other items. Sound recordings distributed outside the United States are not subject to the tax-exempt entity leasing provisions of this bill.

The provisions are generally effective for sound recordings placed in service after March 15, 1984.

M. MISCELLANEOUS TAX REFORM PROVISIONS

1. Inclusion of tax benefit items

Under present law, an individual taxpayer who receives a State tax refund may exclude from income an amount equal to the excess of the zero bracket amount over the taxpayer's other itemized deductions for the year in which the State taxes were deducted. This exclusion is permitted even though the deduction of this amount in the prior year resulted in a tax benefit.

The bill provides that where a taxpayer recovers a previously-deducted amount, the recovered amount is excluded from gross income only to the extent such amount did not reduce income subject to tax. This provision will apply to amounts recovered after 1983.

2. Low-interest and interest-free loans

Under present law, loans between family members generally result in taxable gifts in an amount equal to the value of the interest that is not charged. No income tax consequences result, however, to either the lender or the borrower. A number of cases have held that demand loans by corporations to their shareholders, and by persons for whom services are performed to persons providing the services, generally do not have any Federal tax consequences.

Under the bill, low-interest and interest-free loans generally are to be recharacterized as (1) a loan to the borrower at a statutory interest rate, and (2) either a gift (in the case of a gratuitous transaction), dividend (in a corporation-shareholder transaction), or compensation (in a transaction involving services), or some other payment in accordance with the substance of the transaction. The borrower is treated as paying interest on the loan at the statutory rate, resulting in income to the lender and a deduction to the borrower. An exception is provided for de minimis transactions that are not tax motivated. In addition, in the case of a loan in which the deemed payment by the lender to the borrower is a gift, the amount of deemed interest paid is generally limited to the amount of passive income of the borrower. This provision is effective for below market loans outstanding on the date of enactment, except for term loans made before February 1, 1984.

3. LIFO conformity

Currently, the "Last-In First-Out" (LIFO) method of inventory accounting may not be used for tax purposes unless it is also used in reporting to shareholders, partners, other proprietors, beneficiaries, or for credit purposes. An issue has arisen as to whether a parent company is subject to these LIFO conformity rules when the inventory is held by a subsidiary company. The bill makes the LIFO conformity requirement applicable to financially related corporations as if they were a single taxpayer, effective for taxable years beginning after the date of enactment.

4. Income averaging

Income averaging is presently available to taxpayers with "averageable income". Averageable income is current year taxable income in excess of 120 percent of average taxable income in the four preceding years. In effect, income averaging widens the tax brackets by a factor of five with respect to averageable income.

The bill increases the 120-percent requirement to 140 percent and provides that only the three preceding years are to be taken into account. The bill modifies income averaging so that it, in effect, widens the tax brackets by a factor of four, not five, with respect to averageable income.

These changes are effective for taxable years beginning after December 31, 1983.

5. Personal use of business property

Present law provides for deductions for the expenses of operating an automobile or other business property in connection with a trade or business, except to the extent used for entertainment purposes. The bill provides that unless business use of an automobile or other business property is at least 90 percent of total use, the investment tax credit and accelerated cost recovery system (ACRS) and, for automobiles, deduction of actual operating expenses is not allowed. The bill provides for specific mileage or depreciation deductions to replace the deductions no longer available. This provision is effective for property purchased, or leases entered into, after March 15, 1984.

6. Treatment of certain related party transactions

The bill amends the related party rules (sec. 267) so that a taxpayer would generally be placed on the cash method of accounting for purposes of deducting business expenses and interest owed to a related party cash basis taxpayer. These rules will be extended to amounts accrued by a partnership to its partners and vice versa.

Also, the bill extends the loss disallowance and accrual provisions to transactions between corporations which are members of a controlled group of corporations, using a 50-percent control test.

These provisions generally will apply to taxable years beginning after 1983. However, the provision will not apply to (1) interest on indebtedness incurred on or before September 29, 1983, or incurred pursuant to a contract binding on that date and all times thereafter and (2) other expenses made pursuant to a contract which was binding on September 29, 1983, and at all times thereafter.

7. Section 1231 property

The bill provides that gains and losses from the sale or exchange of business property will be netted over a period including the prior three taxable years and the three succeeding taxable years in order to determine whether there are net capital gains or net ordinary losses.

The provision will be effective for taxable years beginning after December 31, 1984.

8. Disallowance of certain expenses where taxpayer uses property similar to property owned by taxpayer

The bill clarifies the application of the prohibition on deducting personal, living, or family expenses, by providing expressly that no business deductions are allowable with respect to property owned by a taxpayer if the taxpayer uses similar property for personal purposes under circumstances described in the bill. The provision applies to agreements entered into for the use of property after February 22, 1984.

9. Individual minimum tax—foreign income exclusion

Present law imposes a 20-percent minimum tax on individuals, based on their adjusted gross income plus certain tax preferences, to the extent it exceeds their regular income tax. The bill provides that the income excluded under section 911 will be a tax preference. The foreign tax credit will be allowed against the minimum tax attributable to that income. This provision will be effective for taxable years beginning after December 31, 1984.

10. Use of related party structures to reduce tax on coal operations

Under present law, taxpayers may reduce the effective rate of tax on coal mining operations by establishing related party structures to take advantage of the capital gains treatment provided in section 631(c). The Code expressly prohibits such multi-party structures in the case of iron ore. The bill extends the related party prohibition to coal royalties, effective on the date of enactment.

11. Dividend reinvestment plans for utilities

Present law provides an exclusion for up to $750 of dividends reinvested in public utility stock, effective through 1985. The bill repeals the exclusion for dividends received from public utilities, effective for distributions made after 1984.

12. Estimated income tax for individuals

The individual estimated income tax rules are amended to allow the Secretary to waive the penalty for failure to make payments by reason of a casualty, disaster or other unusual circumstance where it would be inequitable to impose the penalty. Estimated tax payments of the alternative minimum tax will be required.

The provision will be effective for taxable years beginning after 1984.

13. Taxation of Federal Home Loan Mortgage Corporation

The bill repeals the tax exemption of the Federal Home Loan Mortgage Corporation ("Freddie Mac"), effective January 1, 1985.

14. Interest deductions on debt used to carry or purchase tax-exempt obligations

Under present law, no deduction is allowed for interest on indebtedness incurred to purchase or carry tax-exempt securities. The bill clarifies the present rule to disallow interest on obligations of a taxpayer or certain related persons which is incurred to purchase or carry tax-exempt obligations of the taxpayer or a related person.

TITLE II.—LIFE INSURANCE TAX PROVISIONS

1. Company taxation

Under present law, life insurance companies may be taxed on different tax bases. As a consequence, different companies derive varying degrees of benefit from the various special deductions generally allowable only to life insurance companies and from the reserve computation rules of present law.

In lieu of the present law three-phase pattern of taxation which applies to life insurance companies, the bill provides a new single-phase tax structure. This structure embodies the tax rules applicable to corporations generally except that certain special rules apply to address issues unique to the life insurance industry.

a. Computation of the deduction for reserves

Under the bill, deductions for additions to reserves more closely reflect each company's liabilities to policyholders than do solvency reserves used for State law purposes. Further, the deductions are computed on the basis of uniform rules regardless of the particular assumptions used for purposes of computing statutory reserves.

Under these rules, a life insurance company can deduct an amount equal to the excess of the higher of (1) the net surrender value of the contract or (2) the Federally prescribed reserve of the contract, over the amount of the reserve for tax purposes at the end of the prior year. The Federally prescribed reserve is the reserve computed using assumptions that generally reflect the minimum assumptions permitted to be made under most State laws.

b. Limitation on mutual company deductions

A mutual life insurance company is owned by its policyholders. These policyholders receive distributions from the company which may represent price reductions or other policyholder benefits, interest, or returns on the policyholders' investment in the enterprise.[1] Under the bill, amounts distributed by a mutual company to policyholders are, in effect, fragmented, and no deduction is allowed at the company level for amounts distributed to policyholders in their capacity as owners of the company. This is accomplished by means of an ownership differential provision. Under this provision, each mutual company's deductions for payments and credits to policyholders are reduced by the amount of an imputed return on the company's equity. There is a special 5-year transition rule for certain mutuals with much higher than average equities.

The bill also mandates a study in which the Treasury would analyze the operation of the ownership differential provision in its first 3 years.

c. Stock life insurance subsidiaries of mutual companies

As a general rule, under the bill, a stock life insurance subsidiary of a mutual life insurance company is treated as a stock company for tax purposes. However, for purposes of computing the limitation on mutual company deductions, the equity of a stock subsidiary is included in the mutual parent.

[1] In contrast, a stock life insurance company is owned by shareholders. Although a stock company may pay policyholder dividends to its policyholders, such amounts would generally include only price reductions and policyholder benefits.

d. Special rule for small companies

Under the bill, a small life insurance company is allowed a deduction equal to 60 percent of the first $3 million of its otherwise taxable income. This deduction phases out as otherwise taxable income increases from $3 million to $15 million. The amount of this deduction is computed on the basis of a controlled group and does not apply to income related to noninsurance activities. Generally, a small company is one the assets of which (computed on the basis of an affiliated group including both insurance and noninsurance members) are less than $500 million.

e. Rate reduction

All life insurance companies are allowed a deduction equal to 20 percent of their otherwise taxable income. This deduction is computed on the basis of a controlled group and does not apply to income related to noninsurance activities. The bill also provides a transition rule for certain rapidly growing companies under which they may elect for the first four years to claim an amount equal to a portion of their qualified first year premiums in lieu of the small life insurance company and special life insurance company deductions.

f. Tax-exempt income

Under present law, liabilities to policyholders are treated as funded proportionately out of taxable and tax-exempt income. The bill generally continues this approach.

g. Reinsurance

The provision under which the Treasury is granted authority to reallocate income, deductions, assets, reserves, credits, and other items in the case of related party reinsurance contracts is retained and broadened in its application.

h. Definition of a life insurance company

For purposes of determining whether a company qualifies as a life insurance company, funds held with respect to contracts that do not involve permanent purchase rate guarantees are not to be treated as insurance reserves.

i. Effective date

Generally, the effective date for provisions dealing with the taxation of life insurance companies is January 1, 1984. Income that would otherwise result from recomputation of reserves (including section 818(c) recomputations and statutory-to-tax recomputations) and the change in accounting for policyholder dividends at the beginning of 1984 is forgiven under the bill.

The amount of deferred gain from operations held in the policyholder surplus account of the company (the Phase III account) would be frozen at its 1983 year-end level and distributions from such account would be taxed when distributed under the present law rules, which are retained.

2. Life insurance products

a. Definition of life insurance

Present law does not contain a definition of life insurance or of a life insurance contract. It does, however, contain temporary rules for purposes of determining whether benefits paid under certain flexible premium products qualify as life insurance benefits exempt from income tax. The bill adopts a definition that is based on the temporary rules contained in present law. A contract is treated as a life insurance contract if it meets (1) a "cash value accumulation" test, or (2) a "guideline premium" and "cash value corridor" test. Under the cash value accumulation test a contract qualifies if the cash surrender value accumulated under the contract does not exceed the cash surrender value which would arise in a traditional whole life policy assuming a reasonable interest rate is used in computing cash surrender value. Under the guideline premium limitation, contracts are disqualified if the amount of the policyholder's investment in the contract exceeds a traditional level of investment. The cash value corridor disqualifies contracts which build up excessive amounts of cash surrender value relative to life insurance risk. Generally, the new definition applies to contracts issued after December 31, 1984, except for new plans of insurance and certain increasing death benefit policies which must satisfy new rules starting on January 1, 1984. The temporary rules for flexible premium products are also extended through 1984.

For contracts that fail to meet the definition at any time, the pure insurance portion of the contract (i.e., the difference between the face amount and the cash surrender value) will be treated as term life insurance. The cash surrender value will be treated as an annuity. The company issuing the policy will be subject to an excise tax of 10 percent of the cash surrender value at the time of disqualification.

b. Annuities

Under the bill, the present law exception from the 5-percent penalty for distributions of income allocable to investments within 10 years is repealed. Thus, the penalty generally will apply to distributions prior to age 59-1/2. In addition, if the owner of a deferred annuity dies prior to annuitization, the income in the annuity must be distributed within 5 years unless the beneficiary receiving the annuity contract is a spouse, minor child, or handicapped individual.

c. Group-term life insurance

The anti-discrimination rules and the $50,000 limitation on the exclusion from income of premiums for group-term benefits are extended to retired employees. For plans not in existence on January 1, 1984, these rules are effective for taxable years beginning after 1983. The extension of the $50,000 limitation will not apply to group plans existing on January 1, 1984, if the covered individual was 55 years or older on January 1, 1984. The new anti-discrimination rules will apply to existing plans starting March 15, 1987, for employees retiring after that date.

TITLE III.—REVISION OF PRIVATE FOUNDATION PROVISIONS

1. Charitable deduction rules

The bill conforms the income tax treatment of contributions by individuals to private nonoperating foundations to that provided for contributions to public charities or private nonoperating foundations, effective for contributions made after 1984.

2. Divestiture of excess business holdings

Post-1969 gifts or bequests.—The IRS will have discretionary authority under certain circumstances to extend for an additional five years the period for disposing of certain excess business holdings acquired by a private foundation after 1969 by gift or bequest.

Pre-1969 holdings.—The bill allows a foundation to retain excess business holdings acquired prior to May 26, 1969, if (1) the management of the foundation and the management of the business enterprise are sufficiently unrelated, (2) no disqualified person who was not a foundation manager on March 12, 1984, can become a foundation manager, (3) no disqualified person receives compensation (other than reasonable directors' fees) from both the foundation and the business enterprise, (4) the foundation continues to meet the payout rules of present law, and (5) the foundation and any disqualified persons comply with the section 4943 rules applicable to post-1969 holdings.

The bill also provides that if the combined holdings of a private foundation and disqualified persons exceeded 95 percent on May 26, 1969, the foundation will have a 20-year period to reduce pre-1969 excess business holdings (rather than a 15-year period). In addition, a special rule excepts a qualified employee stock ownership plan from the definition of a disqualified person, only for purposes of section 4943, with respect to excess business holdings of a foundation acquired pursuant to the provisions of a pre-1969 will. A technical amendment to current law clarifies that the Herndon Foundation could continue to hold a majority interest in certain business enterprises.

"Downward ratchet" rule.—The bill provides an exception to the so-called "downward ratchet" rule. Under the exception, certain reductions of less than two percent in a foundation's holdings are disregarded where resulting from certain stock issuances.

3. Expenditure responsibility and reliance rules

The Treasury Department is to review its expenditure responsibility regulations for purposes of modifying requirements which are found to be unduly burdensome or unnecessary.

The bill provides that a foundation making a grant to a charitable organization may rely in specified circumstances on an IRS determination of the organization's public charity or operating foundation status, effective for grants made after 1984.

4. Abatement of first-tier penalty taxes

The bill provides the Internal Revenue Service with discretionary authority to abate the automatic first-tier penalty taxes (other than the sec. 4941 tax on self-dealing) if the foundation establishes that the violation was due to reasonable cause and not to willful neglect, and corrects the violation. This provision applies to taxable events occurring after 1984.

5. Definitions

The bill provides that the lineal descendants who are considered members of the family of a substantial contributor or other disqualified person, and thus themselves are considered to be disqualified persons (sec. 4946), are limited to the individual's children, grandchildren, and their spouses, effective January 1, 1985.

In addition, the bill provides rules under which a person's status as a substantial contributor (sec. 507(d)) terminates in certain circumstances after 10 years with no connection to the foundation, effective for post-1984 taxable years. Also, the bill provides special retroactive relief from the excise tax on self-dealing in a particular case where continued status as a disqualified person had triggered tax on a 1978 transaction, provided that the foundation received fair market value.

6. Public disclosure requirements

The bill provides that, beginning in 1985, private foundation notices which must be published annually in a newspaper (sec. 6104(d)) are to include the telephone number of the foundation's principal office. Also, the Internal Revenue Service is directed to enforce fully the present-law rules concerning Form 990-PF information returns.

7. Certain operating foundations

The bill provides that a private operating foundation (such as a museum or library) that previously had been publicly supported for at least 10 years (or qualified as an operating foundation on January 1, 1983), that has a governing body broadly representative of the general public (with at least 75 percent consisting of persons unrelated to the foundation), and none of whose officers otherwise are disqualified persons, will be exempt from the two percent excise tax on net investment income, and grants to such foundations will not be subject to the expenditure responsibility rules. These provisions are effective for post-1984 taxable years and grants.

TITLE IV.—ENTERPRISE ZONES

The bill provides for the designation of certain distressed areas as enterprise zones and for tax incentives and regulatory relief for economic activity within the zones. Under these provisions, up to 75 enterprise zones are to be designated by the Secretary of the Department of Housing and Urban Development, beginning on January 1, 1985, over a period of 3 years, although no more than 25 designations may be made during each year. At least one-third of the designated zones will be in rural areas. Each enterprise zone is eligible for Federal tax and regulatory relief. The duration of each zone is 20 years, plus a 4-year phaseout period. Areas are to be nominated for enterprise zone designation by one or more local governments and the State in which the area is located. Areas nominated for such a designation have to meet certain criteria of economic distress, and designations are made through a competitive process weighing suggested plans for developing the area through tax and regulatory relief, improved services, and involvement of neighborhood and community organizations and private entities in development efforts.

Under the bill, the following Federal tax incentives are available in enterprise zones: An additional 3-percent or 5-percent investment tax credit for investments in personal property and a 10-percent credit for investments in new structures in the zone; a 10-percent credit to employers for increases in payroll to qualified zone employees and a credit for hiring disadvantaged workers for zone employment; a 5-percent credit to zone employees for wages received from zone employers; an exclusion from tax on capital gains attributable to zone property; allowance of full ACRS deductions for facilities in zones financed by industrial development bonds despite the limitation of such deductions for comparably financed facilities elsewhere, and the continued availability of the small issue exemption for industrial development bonds in zones after December 31, 1986, despite its termination on that date elsewhere.

TITLE V.—FOREIGN SALES CORPORATIONS

Present law provides a system of tax deferral for Domestic International Sales Corporations (DISCs) and their shareholders. A DISC is a domestic subsidiary of a U.S. company engaged in exporting. The income attributable to exports may be apportioned between the parent and the DISC using special pricing rules.

The bill provides for the establishment of foreign sales corporations (FSCs) which typically will be foreign incorporated subsidiaries of U.S. parent corporations engaged in exporting. To qualify as a FSC, a corporation will have to be organized under the laws of a jurisdiction outside the U.S. customs area and meet certain foreign presence requirements.

The provisions of the bill will apply to the export income of a FSC if it is managed outside the United States and if some economic processes of the transaction take place outside the United States. In addition, the proposal will apply to the export income of a small FSC attributable to up to $5,000,000 of export receipts whether or not its management or economic processes are foreign.

Under the optional administrative pricing rules, a FSC may earn the greater of 17 percent of the combined taxable income that it and a related party derive from an export transaction, or 1.83 percent of the gross receipts from the transaction.

The bill will exempt a portion of the export income of a FSC from U.S. tax. If a transaction is subject to one of the administrative transfer pricing rules, the exempt portion will be 17/23 of the FSC's income from the transaction. The rest of export income (including generally 6/23 of the FSC's income) will be subject to U.S. tax. Dividends from export income paid by a FSC to a U.S. corporate shareholder will be tax-exempt at the corporate shareholder level.

Companies may continue to use the present DISC rules for up to $10 million of export receipts but will be required to pay interest on the deferred tax. In addition, the bill treats accumulated DISC income (and the previously untaxed income of an Export Trading Company (ETC) if such company elects to discontinue operating as an ETC) as having been previously taxed, so that tax on those amounts would be forgiven.

This provision will apply to transactions after December 31, 1984.

TITLE VI.—HIGHWAY REVENUE PROVISIONS

1. Heavy vehicle use tax and diesel fuel tax

Under present law, the highway use tax is scheduled to increase beginning July 1, 1984, reaching a maximum rate of $1,900 per year on the heaviest vehicles by July 1, 1988. The bill restructures the use tax to eliminate tax on vehicles under 55,000 pounds, reduce the rate of tax on vehicles between 55,000 and 80,000 pounds, and reduce the maximum rate of tax applicable to vehicles over 80,000 pounds to $600 per year, effective July 1, 1984. Rules applicable to small owner-operators are amended, effective July 1, 1984. The rate of tax on certain vehicles registered to haul harvested forested products will be reduced to one-half the rate otherwise applicable, beginning July 1, 1984. The Department of Transportation is instructed to study the effects of the use tax on international carriers.

The bill increases the excise tax on diesel fuel sold for use in highway vehicles by 6 cents per gallon (the diesel differential) to 15 cents per gallon, effective July 1, 1984. The bill provides for a rebate, generally claimed annually on income tax forms, for the diesel differential paid with respect to taxable diesel fuel used in vehicles of 10,000 pounds or less.

2. One-year extension of refund of taxes on fuels used in certain taxicabs

The bill extends for one year, through September 30, 1985, the present rule permitting a 4-cents-per-gallon refund with respect to Federal excise taxes paid on fuels used in certain taxicabs. The bill further requires a Treasury Department study of the effectiveness of this exemption, to be submitted to Congress not later than January 1, 1985.

3. Modification of excise tax exemption for alcohol fuels, mixtures and alcohol fuels; alcohol fuels credit; and duty on imported alcohol fuels

The bill increases the present 5-cents-per-gallon excise tax exemption for alcohol fuels mixtures (e.g., gasohol) to 6 cents per gallon. The alcohol fuels credit and the duty on imported alcohol fuels are correspondingly increased to 60 cents per gallon from their present level of 50 cents per gallon.

The bill retains the present 9-cents-per-gallon excise tax exemption for alcohol fuels (e.g., methanol) that are at least 85 percent pure and permits a 4½-cents-per-gallon exemption for qualified methanol and ethanol fuels comprised of such alcohol derived from natural gas.

These provisions are effective on July 1, 1984.

4. Exemption from sales tax for piggyback trailers

Present law imposes a 12-percent tax on the first retail sale of heavy truck trailers. Piggyback trailers are not specifically exempt from this tax. The bill will exempt piggyback trailers and semitrailers sold after December 2, 1982, from this tax and the prior law 10-percent manufacturers excise tax.

5. Floor stocks refunds with respect to certain tax-reduced tires and retread rubber

The bill provides that floor stocks refunds will be available with respect to tires on which Federal excise tax was reduced, but not repealed, on January 1, 1984. Additionally, these refunds will be permitted with respect to tread rubber on retread tires held for sale on January 1, 1984. This provision will be effective on enactment.

TITLE VII.—TAX-EXEMPT BOND PROVISIONS

1. Mortgage subsidy bonds and mortgage credit certificates

The bill extends the authority of State and local governments to issue qualified mortgage bonds for four years, until December 31, 1987. The bonds are subject to the eligibility requirements and volume limitations that applied before expiration of the prior law qualified mortgage bond provisions on December 31, 1983. In addition, issuers of qualified mortgage bonds are required to file information reports on each issue of such bonds.

The bill restricts the issuance of mortgage subsidy bonds under the transition rules of the Mortgage Subsidy Bond Tax Act of 1980. The transition rules of that Act allowing issuance of tax-exempt mortgage subsidy bonds for new mortgages are repealed, with the exception of certain projects, for bonds issued after December 31, 1984. The volume of mortgage subsidy bonds issued under these rules after April 21, 1984, reduces the applicable volume limitation on a State's authority to issue qualified mortgage subsidy bonds.

The bill permits State and local governments to exchange qualified mortgage bond authority in any year for authority to issue mortgage credit certificates (MCCs). The State or local government could issue certificates to provide tax credits of 20 percent of the interest paid on new mortgages in principal amount equivalent to the principal amount of MSB authority surrendered, or to provide a greater (or lesser) rate of tax credits on a smaller (or larger) principal amount. MCCs entitle homebuyers to nonrefundable tax credits of from 10 to 50 percent of the interest paid on home mortgage indebtedness. MCCs are limited to first-time homebuyers having incomes below the local area median income, with adjustments for family size, and to the purchase of residences with an acquisition price that does not exceed 90 percent of the applicable average area purchase price. The bill allows MCCs to be used for interest on blanket mortgages deemed paid by a qualifying tenant-shareholder in a housing cooperative and, under Treasury regulations, for certain manufactured housing. Authority to trade-in qualified mortgage bond authority for authority to issue MCCs terminates on December 31, 1987.

2. Other private activity bonds

The bill imposes new restrictions on industrial development bonds and on student loan bonds.

a. Restrictions on cost recovery deductions for IDB-financed property.—The bill extends the cost-recovery periods for IDB-financed property which is presently restricted to deductions based on the straight-line method over ACRS periods. The new recovery periods will be as follows:

Type of property:	New recovery period
3-year property	4 years
5-year property	7 years
10-year property	13 years
15-year public utility property	20 years
20-year nonresidential real property	22 years

These provisions apply generally to property placed in service after June 30, 1984, to the extent the property is financed with the proceeds of bonds issued after March 15, 1984. An exception is provided for facilities (1) where the original use commences with the taxpayer and construction of the facility commenced before March 15, 1984, or (2) with respect to which a binding contract existed on March 15, 1984, committing the purchaser to incur significant expenditures for construction or acquisition of the facilities.

b. Restrictions on Federal guarantees of tax-exempt obligations.—The bill denies tax-exemption to State and local obligations to the extent the proceeds of the obligations are insured by FDIC, FSLIC, or other Federal deposit insurance, effective for obligations issued after April 15, 1983, except for obligations issued pursuant to a written commitment binding on March 4, 1983, and at all times thereafter. Additionally, for bonds issued after the date of enactment, tax-exemption is denied if the bonds were guaranteed under the Small Business Administration's pollution control or certified development loan program, unless the SBA charged a fair market value loan guarantee fee equal to at least one percent of the bond amount.

c. Restrictions on use of small issue IDBs where beneficiary has significant IDB use.—The bill restricts the use of small issue IDBs if the total amount of all IDBs that would be outstanding after the issue for the beneficiary of the current issue exceeds $40 million. In determining whether the $40 million limit has been reached, both exempt purpose and small issue IDBs are counted.

d. Denial of tax-exempt IDB financing for certain facilities.—The bill denies tax-exemption for bond issues if any portion of the proceeds of an issue are to be used to finance any airplane, skybox or other private luxury box, any facility used for gambling, or any store the principal business of which is the sale of alcoholic beverages for consumption off-premises. This prohibition applies both to exempt purpose and small issue IDBs.

e. Application of small issue limitation to entire project.—The bill changes the present-law rule under which it may be possible to divide a project into several nominally separate facilities, each costing $10 million or less, and to finance each separate facility with small issue IDBs. Under the provision, where two or more issues of IDBs are used to finance a single building, enclosed shopping mall, or a strip of offices, stores, or warehouses that use substantial common facilities, the two or more issues are treated as a single issue for purposes of determining qualification under the small issue exception. Additionally, all principal users of any of the facilities are treated as principal users of the entire facility.

f. Extension of substantial user rule to all members of a partnership and an S corporation.—The bill amends the rules of present law under which interest on IDBs is not exempt from tax if the bonds are owned by a substantial user of the facilities financed with the IDBs or the bondholder is a related person to that substantial user. Under the amendment, all partners of a partnership and all shareholders of an S corporation are treated as related persons to the partnership or S corporation.

g. Extension of Internal Revenue Code rules to certain obligations.—The bill extends the Internal Revenue Code rules relating to tax-exempt bonds to bonds which are exempt under provisions of Federal law outside of the Code. The bill provides authority for the Virgin Islands and American Samoa to issue IDBs.

h. Arbitrage restrictions.—The bill applies modified arbitrage restrictions, similar to the existing arbitrage rules for mortgage subsidy bonds, to industrial development bonds (other than student loan bonds and certain bonds for housing and sewage and solid waste facilities) issued after December 31, 1984.

i. Certain bonds of the Power Authority of the State of New York.—The bill exempts certain bonds of the Power Authority of New York from the restrictions applicable to IDBs generally.

j. Student loan bond and other provisions.—The bill contains several provisions regarding tax-exempt student loan and certain other bonds. Under these provisions, issuers of student loan bonds are required to devote all profits attributable to bond proceeds to the acquisition of additional student loan notes under the issuer's loan program.

Following a study of the role of tax-exempt bonds for student loans, existing arbitrage rules for student loan bonds would be superseded by new Treasury regulations. These regulations are effective upon the later of (1) the expiration or reauthorization of the Guaranteed Student Loan (GSL) program or (2) six months after publication. The regulations will not apply to certain bonds issued to refund obligations issued before the effective date of the regulations or to satisfy certain binding commitments to acquire student loans.

Effective on the date of enactment, entities authorized to issue tax-exempt student loan bonds are permitted to elect to treat any issue as taxable without prejudice to the tax-exempt status of any other outstanding or future issue.

The bill provides that the proceeds of tax-exempt bonds issued after the date of enactment generally may not be used to acquire notes or other obligations of individuals other than student loan notes under the GSL program, except as otherwise explicitly provided in the Internal Revenue Code. Transitional rules are provided for existing non-GSL student loan programs. In addition, this prohibition does not apply to non-GSL student loan bonds issued after September 30, 1986.

k. Effective dates.—The provisions described in items c, d, e, f, and g, which are similar to provisions contained in H.R. 4170, as reported by the House Committee on Ways and Means, on March 5, 1984, generally are effective for bonds issued after December 31, 1983. Exceptions are provided for facilities (1) financed with an obligation where the original use of the facility commences with the taxpayer and where its construction began before October 19, 1983, or (2) with respect to which a binding contract to incur significant expenditures was entered into before October 19, 1983. Transitional rules are provided to various provisions with respect to certain projects presently in progress.

TITLE VIII.—MISCELLANEOUS REVENUE PROVISIONS

A. ESTATE AND GIFT TAX PROVISIONS

1. Qualification of certain holding company stock for installment payment of estate tax

Under present law, estate tax attributable to interests in certain closely held businesses can be paid in installments over up to 14 years, with principal payments being deferred for up to 5 years of that time. Additionally, a special 4-percent interest rate is available for certain amounts of deferred tax. Generally, only directly owned interests in active business operations are eligible for this benefit.

The bill permits executors to elect to consider the value of indirectly owned nonreadily tradeable stock in an active business for certain purposes under the installment payment provision if the business interest would qualify were it owned directly. Thus, multiple tiers of holding companies may be looked through and certain interests in multiple active businesses aggregated. If this election is made, the 4-percent interest rate and 5-year deferral of principal payments are not available.

The bill further provides that investment assets held by any business are to be disregarded for all purposes under the installment payment provision. This rule is consistent with the present-law rule for valuing businesses carried on as proprietorships.

These provisions are effective for estates of individuals dying after the date of enactment.

2. Repeal of the generation-skipping transfer tax

The bill repeals the tax on generation-skipping transfers, generally effective for transfers occurring after June 11, 1976.

3. Tax treatment of certain disclaimers of interests transferred before November 15, 1958

Under present law, property with respect to which a qualified disclaimer is made is treated as if it had never been transferred to the person making the disclaimer. Therefore, the person making the disclaimer is not treated as making a gift. For property transferred after 1976, the Code has included specific rules for making qualified disclaimers. For property transferred before 1977, Treasury regulations, adopted on November 15, 1958, provided the rules governing disclaimers.

The bill provides that disclaimers of property transferred before November 15, 1958, will be treated as qualified disclaimers if the disclaimers meet the requirements of present law (Code sec. 2518), except for the requirement that a disclaimer be made within 9 months after the date the property is transferred. Therefore, property with respect to which a person has accepted any benefits may not be disclaimed under this provision.

The provision is effective upon date of enactment and applies to disclaimers that are made within 90 days after enactment with respect to property interests transferred before November 15, 1958.

4. Clarification that certain usufruct interests qualify for estate tax marital deduction

The Economic Recovery Tax Act of 1981 permitted executors to elect to claim an estate marital deduction for the value of certain qualifying income interests for life (so-called "QTIP" property). An income interest qualifies as QTIP property only if the surviving spouse is entitled to all of the income from the interest (payable at least annually) and no person has a power to appoint the property to any person other than the surviving spouse (except for powers exercisable only at or after the spouse's death).

The bill clarifies that certain usufructs for life under the Louisiana Civil Code may qualify as QTIP property, if certain requirements are satisfied.

This provision is effective as if included in the Economic Recovery Tax Act.

5. Special estate tax credits for the Estate of Nell J. Redfield and the Estate of Elizabeth Schultz Rabe

The bill provides a special credit against Federal estate tax for the estates of Nell J. Redfield and Elizabeth Schultz Rabe. The credit will apply to the transfer to the Secretary of Agriculture, within 90 days after the bill's enactment, of certain real property located within or adjacent to the Toiyabe National Forest that is included in the estates in question. The amount of the credit will be equal to the lesser of the fair market value of the property as of the date it is transferred or the transferor estate's Federal estate tax liability (plus interest).

B. CHARITABLE CONTRIBUTIONS PROVISIONS

1. Expansion of circumstances in which a deduction may be claimed for qualified conservation contributions

Present law permits a deduction for contributions of qualified property interests for conservation purposes if certain requirements are satisfied. One of these requirements is that surface mining must be prohibited on the property with respect to which the contribution is made. The bill repeals the surface mining prohibition if the following two requirements are satisfied: (1) the surface and mineral estates in the property were separated before June 13, 1976, and (2) the probability of surface mining occurring on the property is so remote as to be negligible.

2. Contributions to the U.S. Olympic Committee

The bill provides that individuals may elect to have $1 ($2 on a joint return) of their tax refund designated to the U.S. Olympic Committee, or to pay an additional income tax of $1 ($2 on a joint return). The Treasury will pay over amounts so designated, less administrative costs, to the U.S. Olympic Committee. A trust fund is established in the Treasury to administer the collection and payment of such funds. The provision will be effective for returns filed for taxable years beginning after December 31, 1983, and ending before January 1, 1989.

3. Charitable expense deduction for use of automobile

The bill increases, from 9 cents per mile to 12 cents per mile, the standard mileage rate allowed as a charitable deduction (if the actual expense method is not used) for use of a passenger automobile in rendering services to a charitable organization, effective January 1, 1985.

4. Permanent rules for reforming governing instruments creating charitable remainder trusts and other charitable interests

Under present law, a charitable deduction is permitted for an interest in a split-interest trust (i.e., a trust with both charitable and noncharitable beneficiaries), only if the trust takes specified forms. The bill provides permanent rules for reforming (amending) charitable split-interest trusts that do not meet the specified form. Under the bill, a trust will be deemed to be reformed properly if property passes directly to charity under the terms of the governing trust instrument. The provision applies generally to reformations occurring after December 31, 1978, other than reformations permitted under the law as in effect before the bill's enactment.

5. Charitable contribution deduction limitations

The bill increases, from 50 percent to 60 percent of the donor's adjusted gross income, the limitation on the charitable deduction for contributions by an individual of cash or ordinary-income property. Also, the carryover of charitable contributions exceeding an applicable percentage limitation is extended from five years to 15 years. These changes are effective for contributions made after 1984.

C. EXCISE TAX PROVISIONS

1. Sport Fish Restoration and Boating Safety Funds; excise tax on certain arrows

The bill replaces the present manufacturers excise tax on fishing equipment with an expanded tax imposed on the last sale of sport fishing equipment before retail. Certain articles are subject to the new tax at a 10-percent rate and others (i.e., tackle boxes, fishfinders, and electric outboard motors) at a 3-percent rate. The bill also extends the time for payment of the tax by manufacturers having $100,000 or less of gross sales receipts in the preceding calendar year, with payments by such taxpayers to be required on a quarterly basis.

Further, the bill alters the financing sources and expenditure purposes for the existing sport fish restoration and boating safety programs and the financing sources for the Land and Water Conservation Fund. Among these changes, the bill transfers part of the revenues from the existing tax on motorboat fuels to the sport fish restoration program. The bill also transfers administration of funding for the sport fish restoration and boating safety programs to a new Aquatic Resources Trust Fund to be included in the Internal Revenue Code.

Also, the bill expands the existing excise tax on arrows to include arrows used by crossbow hunters.

These provisions generally are effective on October 1, 1984; the tax on tackle boxes and fishfinders will apply on October 1, 1985.

2. Increase in the distilled spirits excise tax rate

The bill increases the excise tax rate on distilled spirits from $10.50 per proof gallon to $12.50 per proof gallon, effective on January 1, 1985. This change will increase the excise tax paid on a fifth of 86-proof whiskey by approximately 32 cents.

3. Exemption from aviation excise taxes for certain helicopter operations

The present exemption from the airways fuels and passenger ticket taxes for helicopters engaged in timber operations or hard mineral exploration, and not using the federally aided airport or Federal airways control systems, are extended by the bill to helicopters engaged in oil and gas exploration, effective on April 1, 1984.

4. Technical amendments to the Hazardous Substance Response Revenue Act of 1980

Present law imposes an excise tax on certain chemical substances, the revenue from which go into the Hazardous Substance Response Trust Fund. The bill makes technical modifications to this excise tax in three areas. First, an exemption is provided for light hydrocarbons used in the production of motor fuels. Second, certain copper, lead, or zinc compounds which have a transitory existence during metal refining are exempted from tax. Third, the administrative mechanism through which the exemption for fertilizer may be claimed is simplified.

D. EMPLOYEE BENEFITS

1. Unemployment compensation for pre-1978 periods

The bill amends the Revenue Act of 1978 to provide that the provisions of that statute which make includible in income a portion of unemployment compensation benefits apply to payments of unemployment compensation made after 1978 except payments for weeks of unemployment ending before December 1, 1978. The bill also extends until one year after enactment the period for claiming any credit or refund attributable to this amendment.

2. Employee stock options

The bill provides that an employee may defer income on the exercise of certain employee stock options until the employee disposes of the stock. These options may not be issued solely to highly compensated officers and shareholder-employees. This provision is effective for options exercised after the date of enactment. Two technical amendments are made to the incentive stock option provision.

3. Income tax exclusion for certain employee achievement awards

The bill provides a new income-tax exclusion to employees for certain awards received (after the date of enactment) from an employer for productivity, safety, or length of service. The exclusion allowed to an employee in one year applies to the extent that the employer's cost for all awards to that employee in the year does not exceed $4,800 in the case of qualified plan awards, or $1,200 for other awards. The exclusion is available only for watches, clocks, rings, emblematic jewelry, certain personal accessories, and other traditional retirement or nonretirement awards. Any excess of the lesser of the employer's cost for or the value of such awards over the exclusion dollar limits will be expressly includible in the employee's gross income, as will the value of nontraditional employee achievement awards or any other awards to employees.

Certain limitations will apply to the exclusion for the employee (and to the deduction allowed to the employer). These include limitations on the number of employees in a business who can be given productivity or safety awards; on how frequently a particular employee can receive productivity, etc. awards; and on the use of nominal awards in calculating the average cost limitation for the definition of a qualified award plan. Also, certain nondiscrimination rules will apply. Recordkeeping and reporting requirements for an employer's award programs can be imposed by the IRS.

4. Moratorium on fringe benefit regulations

The bill extends for two years (through 1985) the moratorium on issuance of Treasury regulations relating to the income tax treatment of nonstatutory fringe benefits. Also, the extended moratorium applies with respect to certain campus housing provided to employees by educational institutions during 1984 and 1985.

5. Exclusion for educational assistance benefits; timing of deduction for deferred educational benefits

The provisions of present law which exclude employer-provided educational assistance benefits from an employee's income and wages for income and payroll tax purposes do not apply for taxable years beginning after December 31, 1983. The bill extends this exclusion to apply to taxable years beginning on or before December 31, 1985.

Under a recent court case, a plan providing deferred educational benefits for the children of a corporation's employees was held to be a welfare benefit plan, thus allowing the employer a deduction for plan contributions in the year made. The bill provides that such a plan is to be treated as a nonqualified deferred compensation plan, so that deductions for plan contributions will not be allowed until the benefit payments under the plan are included in the employee's gross income.

6. FICA and FUTA exemption for employer payment of certain employee contributions to State and local retirement plans

The bill makes a technical correction to the Social Security Amendments of 1983 to provide that employer payments ("pick-ups") of employee contributions under a State or local retirement plan are subject to FICA and FUTA only if the pickup is pursuant to a salary reduction agreement.

E. MISCELLANEOUS TREASURY ADMINISTRATIVE PROVISIONS

The bill makes a number of minor amendments relating to Treasury administrative provisions. The bill simplifies certain requirements of the Treasury Department to make reports to the Congress, removes the $1 million limitation of the Treasury working capital fund, increases the authorization limit from $1 million to $10 million on the revolving fund for the redemption of real property, allows the Secretary of the Treasury to accept gifts and bequests for the Treasury Department, allows an extension of time for court review of a jeopardy assessment where the government is not promptly served, removes the $1 million limitation on the Secretary of the Treasury's special authority to dispose of obligations, allows the Internal Revenue Service a minimum of 60 days to assess unpaid taxes shown on an amended return, provides the government a lien on the assets of all financial institutions which issue an unpaid guaranteed draft for the payment of taxes, allows the disclosure of windfall profit tax returns to State tax agencies, and repeals the requirement that the Secretary approve changes in taxpayer's financial reporting of the investment credit.

The bill repeals the present occupational tax on manufacturers of stills and makes the present statutory requirement that the Treasury Department be notified upon removal of any still from the place of manufacture discretionary with the Treasury. The bill also modifies the rules governing allowance of drawbacks with respect to distilled spirits used for food or medicinal purposes. Additionally, the Treasury Department is authorized to disclose certain information about alcohol fuel producers to administrators of State alcohol laws. The requirement that certain containers of distilled spirits bear Government-supplied strip stamps is repealed; these containers will continue to be required to bear tamperproof closure devices. The bill also expands the circumstances in which distilled spirits can be withdrawn from bond without payment of tax to permit tax-free withdrawal of such spirits for use in the production of nonbeverage (e.g., cooking) wine.

The bill requires payment of excise taxes on all taxable alcohol and tobacco products not later than 14 days after the end of each semimonthly period. In addition, taxpayers who were liable for more than $5 million in any such tax in the preceding calendar year are required under the bill to pay such taxes during the succeeding year by electronic funds transfer to a Federal Reserve bank. This provision is effective on July 1, 1984.

Present law provides an exclusion from income for certain payments to a utility in aid of construction if expenditures are made in the following two years. The bill extends the statute of limitations with respect to the treatment of these payments until expiration of the statute on the last year in which expenditures may be made if the payment is to be excluded from income.

F. SIMPLIFICATION AND EXTENSION OF INCOME TAX CREDITS

1. Simplification of income tax credits

In general, the bill groups existing income tax credits into logical categories and provides uniform tax liability limitations and carryover rules. The business credits (i.e., investment tax credit, targeted jobs credit, alcohol fuels credit, and ESOP credit) will be combined into one credit and allowed up to 100 percent of the first $25,000 of tax liability and 85 percent of the remainder. The research credit will continue to be allowable against 100 percent of tax liability. A 3-year carryback and 15-year carryforward period on a FIFO basis will be allowed for the business credits.

This provision will apply to taxable years beginning after 1983.

2. Business energy tax credits

The bill extends the 15-percent renewable energy credit, the 15-percent ocean thermal credit and the 10-percent biomass credit (with certain modifications) through the end of 1988. The affirmative commitment rules for synfuel projects are extended to encompass projects for which the engineering and permitting requirements are satisfied by January 1, 1987, if the contracting requirements are satisfied by January 1, 1990, and the project is completed by January 1, 1993. The water temperature requirement for geothermal property is reduced from 50 degrees Celsius to 40 degrees Celsius. Allocation rules are provided for equipment that uses an alternative energy resource at least 50 percent of the time.

Special affirmative commitment rules extend the solar, wind, and geothermal credit and the ocean thermal credit through 1989 for projects on which the engineering and permitting requirements are met by the end of 1988 and the contracting requirements met by July 1, 1989.

3. Residential energy tax credits

The bill repeals the residential energy conservation tax credits on the date of enactment and extends the residential solar, wind, and geothermal energy tax credits through 1987.

4. Extension of targeted jobs credit

Under present law, the targeted jobs credit is available with respect to individuals who begin work for the employer before 1985. The bill extends the targeted jobs credit for three additional years. Under the bill, the credit will be available with respect to any member of a targeted group who begins work for the employer before 1988.

G. 6-MONTH LONG-TERM HOLDING PERIOD AND REDUCTION OF CAPITAL LOSS OFFSET AGAINST ORDINARY INCOME

Gains and losses from the sale or exchange of capital assets held for more than 1 year are long-term capital gain or loss and gains and losses from capital assets held for 1 year or less are short-term, under present law. For noncorporate taxpayers, net capital losses may be deducted against $3,000 of ordinary income. However, only 50 percent of long-term losses realized after 1969 may be deducted against ordinary income.

The bill reduces the long-term capital gain and loss holding period to 6 months for assets acquired after February 29, 1984. For taxable years after 1984, the $3,000 ordinary income ceiling against which capital losses may be deducted is reduced to $1,000, and the special treatment of long-term losses realized prior to 1970 is repealed.

H. MISCELLANEOUS REVENUE MATTERS

1. Modification of rules governing rehabilitation investment credit

The bill provides an alternative to the present requirement that at least 75 percent of a building's external walls be retained as external walls in the case of rehabilitations with respect to which a rehabilitation credit is allowable. Under the alternative, the external walls test is deemed met if (1) at least 50 percent of the building's external walls are retained as external walls; (2) at least 75 percent of the building's external walls are retained as either internal or external walls; and (3) at least 75 percent of the building's internal structural framework is retained. This provision is effective for rehabilitation expenditures incurred with respect to property placed in service after December 31, 1983.

2. Taxation of regulated investment companies

a. Personal holding companies permitted to qualify

Under present law, a regulated investment company (RIC) is treated, in essence, as a conduit for tax purposes. If a corporation is a RIC, it is allowed a deduction for dividends paid to its shareholders. One of the requirements that a corporation must meet in order to be a RIC is that it cannot be a personal holding company.

The bill modifies the definition of a regulated investment company (RIC) to permit a personal holding company (PHC) to qualify as a RIC. In the case of a RIC which is a PHC, any undistributed investment company taxable income of the RIC will be taxed at the highest corporate rate. This provision is effective for taxable years beginning after December 31, 1982. The bill also denies RIC status to companies first becoming a RIC after 1982 if the company has earnings and profits accumulated as a non-RIC.

b. Timing of income from short-term government securities

Under present law, the amount of discount income on short-term government securities is includible in income at the earlier of the date of maturity or the date of sale.

The bill allows a RIC to elect to include discount income on short-term government securities as it accrues. This provision is effective for taxable years beginning after 1978.

3. Cooperative housing corporations

Under present law, in order for the tenants of a cooperative housing corporation to receive deductions for interest and taxes paid by the cooperative housing corporation, at least 80 percent of the income of a cooperative housing corporation must be derived from tenant-shareholders.

The bill allows corporations and certain other persons who are not individuals to be tenant-shareholders of a cooperative housing corporation, even if the cooperative housing corporation retains the right to disapprove occupancy by any nominee of the corporation. The bill also disallows a deduction to a corporation or other person who uses its units in a trade or business for rental payments attributable to amounts which must be capitalized by the cooperative housing corporation. The amendment is effective for taxable years beginning after the date of enactment.

4. FUTA exemption for certain fishing boat crewmembers

Remuneration paid to fishing boat crew members generally is subject to tax under the Federal Unemployment Tax Act (FUTA) if the services performed are related to catching halibut or salmon for commercial purposes or if the services are performed on a vessel of more than ten net tons. However, under a provision which expired on December 31, 1982, remuneration paid to fishing boat crew members was exempt from FUTA if the crew members are treated as self-employed for social security tax purposes and the remuneration of whom is exempt from the Federal Insurance Contributions Act (FICA) tax and income tax withholding. Fishing boat crew members are so treated if their remuneration depends on the boat's catch and the crew normally consists of fewer than ten members.

The bill extends through December 31, 1985, the exemption from FUTA tax for remuneration paid to fishing boat crew members who are treated as self-employed for purposes of social security taxes.

5. Extension of PIK rules to 1984 wheat program

Present law provides special tax treatment for commodities received by a producer under a 1983 PIK program for withdrawing land from production. Under these rules, producers may defer recognition of income on PIK commodities until the commodities are sold; PIK participants are not disqualified from various special tax provisions available to taxpayers engaged in the business of farming; and the applicability of income, employment and estate tax provisions is not affected solely as a result of a taxpayer's participation in the PIK program. The bill generally extends these special PIK tax rules to the 1984 wheat program.

6. Exceptions to debt-financed property rules

Under present law, generally a tax-exempt organization is subject to tax on any income (including income from debt-financed property) from an unrelated trade or business. However, the income or gain received with respect to debt-financed real property held by a qualified pension trust is not treated as unrelated trade or business income under certain circumstances. The rules for debt-financed real property are extended to certain educational institutions and are amended to limit the present law exception to situations in which the property subject to the exemption is not financed by the seller or a related party and, in the case of property owned by a partnership, each partner separately qualifies for the exception. The provisions apply with respect to indebtedness incurred after the date of enactment.

7. Title holding companies

Under present law, a title holding company may be exempt from taxation if the company holds assets of related tax-exempt organizations. Under the provision, a title holding company may be exempt from tax even though the company holds assets of certain unrelated tax-exempt organizations, provided that the title holding company's officers and board of directors are independent of the company's investment advisors. In addition, these title holding companies are eligible for the special exceptions relating to debt-financed real property if they submit to the restrictions applicable to qualified pension trusts with respect to this exception, as amended by the bill. The provisions are effective for taxable years beginning after December 31, 1984.

8. Physicians' and surgeons' mutual protection associations

Under present law, amounts paid to a corporation as contributions to capital are not included in the income of the corporation. Also, in general, capital payments made by a policyholder or member of an insurance association, that are in addition to premium payments made, are not deductible by the policyholder. The bill provides a specific rule for the tax treatment of the company and the policyholder with respect to initial capital contributions made by members of certain medical malpractice mutual protection associations. For the policyholder, the rules provide an election, to be made when the initial capital contribution is made, that will allow a policyholder to deduct a portion of that amount over the first 6 years of coverage to the extent that the annual premiums that would have been charged by an independent insurance company for the medical malpractice insurance coverage would have exceeded the actual annual premium charged by the mutual protection association for such coverage. For the company, the rules provide that initial capital contributions are not includible in income to the extent the amounts are not deductible to the policyholder, and any refund of such capital amounts is not deductible. These special rules apply only to such associations that were in operation under the laws of any State prior to January 1, 1984.

9. Sale-leasebacks of principal residences

Under present law, qualification of a transaction with respect to a principal residence as a sale-leaseback of a principal residence sometimes is uncertain. The bill provides a "safe harbor," easing the rules applicable in determining whether a valid sale-leaseback has occurred in the case of sales by taxpayers 55 or older. The provisions are effective for transactions entered into after the date of enactment and before January 1, 1989.

10. Changes in earned income credit

Under present law, eligible taxpayers, i.e., individuals or couples with children, are allowed a refundable tax credit equal to 10 percent of the first $5,000 of earned income, for a maximum credit of $500. The maximum credit is phased down to zero as income increases from $6,000 to $10,000. The bill increases the rate of the earned income credit to 10.5 percent, thereby increasing the maximum credit to $525. The bill also raises the income level at which the credit is fully phased-out to $11,000. These changes in the earned income credit will apply to taxable years beginning after 1984.

11. Capital construction fund for fishery facilities

Under present law, tax benefits are available for certain taxpayers making deposits into capital construction funds to be used with respect to qualified vessels. The bill extends those benefits to certain taxpayers engaged in the fisheries industry and for deposits into capital construction funds to be used with respect to certain fisheries facilities.

The provisions are effective as of the date of enactment.

12. Leases with terminal rental adjustment clauses

Leases of motor vehicles often contain terminal rental adjustment clauses (TRACs). A TRAC passes on to the lessee the risk (or reward) that the vehicle will be worth less (or more) at the end of the lease term than the parties projected when the lease was entered into. Under present law, it has been held that a lease with a TRAC in it does not qualify as a lease for Federal income tax purposes.

Under the bill, TRACs are to be disregarded in determining whether certain motor vehicle leases qualify as leases for Federal income tax purposes. The provisions are effective for transactions entered into before, on, and after the date of enactment.

13. Home won as prize and designed for handicapped foster child of the taxpayer

The bill provides that no interest or penalties will be payable on the Federal income tax liability attributable to receipt of a residence won as a prize, and specially designed for a handicapped foster child of the taxpayer, where certain conditions apply, but only if the tax liability is paid within one year after the date of enactment.

14. Housing allowance for ministers

In 1983, the IRS ruled that ministers may not take deductions for mortgage interest and real estate taxes on their residence to the extent that such expenditures are allocable to tax-free housing allowances provided for ministers. The new deduction disallowance rule generally applied beginning July 1, 1983. Under a transitional rule, in the case of a minister who owned and occupied a home before January 3, 1983 (or had a contract to purchase a home before that date), the deduction disallowance rule generally will not apply until January 1, 1985. The bill extends this transitional rule date to January 1, 1986.

15. Church audits

Present law provides that the IRS may examine church books of account (i.e., financial records) only to the extent necessary for a determination of tax. The IRS is also required to provide special advance notice before examining church books of account.

The bill provides several new restrictions on IRS investigations and audits of churches. Under these provisions, the IRS may commence an investigation of church tax liabilities only if an IRS regional commissioner reasonably believes that a church is not tax-exempt or has taxable income. The IRS will be required to provide expanded notice before examining church books and records and to offer a pre-examination conference to church officials. In addition, an audit of church tax liabilities will generally be required to be completed within two years after commencing an investigation. These provisions are effective for investigations, examinations, and proceedings commencing after the date of enactment.

16. Exclusion from gross income for cancellation of certain student loans

The bill makes permanent the exclusion (enacted in the Tax Reform Act of 1976) for amounts realized by reason of cancellation of certain student loans. The bill limits the exclusion to cases in which the recipient performs certain professional services for any of a broad class of employers.

17. Transitional rule for safe-harbor leasing

The safe-harbor leasing rules are generally not applicable to agreements entered into after December 31, 1983. Under the bill, those rules, as in effect prior to TEFRA, are applicable to certain coal gasification property.

18. Tip reporting

Under present law, if a large employer, for tip reporting purposes, demonstrates to the Secretary that the actual tip rate of his establishment is less than 8 percent, the Secretary may lower the percentage allocated (but not to less than 5 percent). The bill allows employers or a majority of their employees to petition the Secretary for permission to allocate based on a tip rate as low as 2 percent and requires the IRS to provide rules for recordkeeping with respect to tips within a year.

19. Treatment of Indian tribal governments as State governments for tax purposes

The bill makes permanent the present treatment of Indian tribal governments as State governments for most purposes of the Internal Revenue Code. As under present law, tribal governments will continue to be barred from issuing tax-exempt bonds, other than bonds to finance traditional government functions.

20. Amortization of expenditures to rehabilitate low-income rental housing

The bill reenacts for three years, through December 31, 1986, the provision of prior law that permitted amortization over 60 months of certain rehabilitation expenditures incurred with respect to low-income rental housing.

21. Reenactment of denial of deductions for costs of demolishing certified historic structures

The bill reenacts and makes permanent the provision of prior law that denied income tax deductions for costs associated with demolition of certified historic structures. This provision is effective on January 1, 1984.

22. Architectural barrier removal expenses

The bill provides a deduction for up to $35,000 per year of expenses incurred in eliminating architectural and transportation barriers to the handicapped and elderly, effective for taxable years beginning in 1984 and 1985. This provision is similar to an expired provision of prior law.

23. Tax status of nonprofit child care organizations

The bill provides that nonprofit day care centers qualify for tax-exempt status (under sec. 501(c)(3)), and eligibility to receive tax-deductible contributions, if both (1) substantially all of the dependent care provided to children by the organization is for the purpose of enabling individuals to be gainfully employed, and (2) the services provided by the organization are available to the general public. This provision is effective for taxable years beginning after the date of enactment.

24. Tax incentives for research and vocational education

The bill makes certain modifications to the tax incentives for research expenditures enacted in ERTA, generally effective January 1, 1985. The bill also adds new incentives for vocational education.

Extension of credit.—The 25-percent credit allowed for increases in qualified research expenditures, which is scheduled to expire after 1985, is made permanent.

Research definition.—A statutory definition of credit-eligible expenditures is provided, separate from (and not affecting) the definition of research expenditures qualifying for special deduction rules under present law. The new definition targets the credit to technological innovations developed through a process of experimentation relating to new or improved function, performance, etc. (rather than to style, taste, cosmetic, or seasonal design factors). The costs of developing computer software for internal use by the taxpayer could qualify only where the software is used directly in qualified research or certain production processes, or where otherwise permitted by Treasury regulations for certain significant innovative developments. Also, other exclusions and rules are provided as part of the statutory definition of qualified research.

Trade or business test.—Qualified research expenditures of start-up corporations, of existing corporations for new trades or businesses, and of certain partnerships will be eligible for the credit.

University basic research.—In computing the incremental credit under present law, qualified expenditures include 65 percent of corporate expenditures for university basic research; similarly, this amount is treated as qualified research expenditures in a base period year when the corporation calculates the credit in subsequent years. The bill provides a new 25-percent credit for the excess of (1) 65 percent of corporate cash expenditures for university basic research over (2) the sum of the greater of two maintenance-of-effort floors (relating to 1981-83 university basic research expenditures or one percent of 1981-83 total qualified research expenditures) plus an amount relating to university nonresearch contributions in a base period. Also, the bill makes certain other modifications to the university basic research provision.

Scientific equipment donations.—The existing augmented charitable deduction rule is expanded to cover corporate donations of scientific or technological equipment (including used property and new computer software) to universities for certain uses in mathematics, physical or biological sciences, or engineering, and is modified in certain other respects.

Scholarships, loan forgiveness.—Gross income will not include amounts received by graduate students in certain scientific fields as a scholarship, fellowship grant, or qualified student loan forgiveness, notwithstanding that the recipient is required to perform future teaching services for any of a broad class of colleges or universities, provided that such amounts are not received as compensation.

Vocational education.—The bill provides an augmented charitable deduction for corporate donations of certain types of newly manufactured technical and scientific equipment to public community colleges or public technical institutes for certain vocational education uses, if the value of the donated item exceeds $250, and if certain other requirements are satisfied. The augmented deduction is not available for donations of computer software, microcomputers, or certain other computers. In addition, a tax credit is allowed to a corporation for providing qualified teachers from its employees for postsecondary vocational education courses or for hiring qualified vocational instructors on a temporary basis. The amount of the credit would equal $100 for each course taught by an employee (up to five courses), plus $100 for each instructor temporarily hired by the corporation, subject to certain limitations. These provisions are effective for taxable years beginning after 1984.

25. Percentage depletion on secondary and tertiary production

Under present law, the allowance for percentage depletion on secondary and tertiary oil production expired at the end of 1983. The bill corrects the technical error leading to this termination and clarifies that percentage depletion will not be available after 1983 for secondary or tertiary production from proven properties transferred after 1974, unless one of the present law exceptions to the antitransfer rules applies.

26. Study of alternative tax systems

The bill instructs the Secretary of the Treasury to conduct a study within 6 months covering the advisability of developing an alternative tax system that would reduce the complexity of the present income tax system and improve the efficiency and equity of the tax system. Alternative tax systems that should be evaluated include a simplified income tax based on gross income, a consumption-based tax, restructuring and broadening of the current income tax base combined with lowering of current tax rates, a national sales tax, and a value-added tax.

27. Treasury study of foreign taxation of certain U.S. services

Under present law, taxpayers who perform services in the United States for use in foreign countries are subject to full U.S. tax on their income from those services. The foreign country where the services are used may also subject the income from those services to tax. The bill directs the Treasury Department to study the practices of foreign countries that impose taxes on the basis of services that are performed in the United States, including the status of treaty negotiations with such countries, and options to alleviate the resulting double tax burden on U.S. taxpayers. The Treasury Department is to report to the committee on the results of its study no later than August 31, 1984.

28. Migratory bird hunting and conservation stamps ("Duck Stamps")

The Secretary of the Interior is authorized to allow reproductions in color and black and white of migratory bird hunting stamps for commercial purposes. Revenues will be deposited in the Migratory Bird Conservation Fund and will be used to help finance the purchase of additional wetlands acreage to be included in the National Wildlife Refuge.

29. Tax treatment of grants related Boundary Water Canoe Area

The bill allows tax-free reinvestment before 1986 of Federal assistance grants made to motorboat franchisors whose business activities had to be modified to conform to new statutory limits following conversion of their operating areas to the Boundary Waters Canoe Area Wilderness under the jurisdiction of the Forest Service.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, will the manager of the bill be good enough to explain what the modification is?

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I am going to do that right now. The Senator from Kansas is modifying the amendment to H.R. 2163, the Federal Boat Safety Act submitted last Thursday. This modification clarifies several of the provisions of the original amendment, incorporates several additional transition rules to the public property leasing and bond provisions which have been brought to our attention by various Members, and includes a number of technical corrections which are necessary to effectuate the intent of the amendment and to correct typographical errors.

I would like to take a few moments to describe the principal modifications:

PUBLIC PROPERTY LEASING

The following projects have been added to the list of public property leasing transitional rules: Lincoln Plaza, Sacramento, Calif.; Westside Mall parking facilities, Santa Maria, Calif.; Civic Center complex, Monterey Park, Calif.; King Civic Center and Center Street/Sather Gate parking garages, Berkeley, Calif.; Downtown Government Center cogeneration system project, Miami, Fla.; Albuquerque Convention Center, Albuquerque, N. Mex. I think the first ones were requested by Senator CRANSTON; the cogeneration project by Senator KENNEDY; and the Albuquerque Convention Center by Senator DOMENICI.

There was also the North Star Borough Building, Fairbanks, Alaska, requested by Senator STEVENS, along with the Anchorage Office Complex, Anchorage, Alaska; the Bloomfield Co./Holden Joint Venture, Juneau, Alaska; and the Anchorage parking facilities, Anchorage municipality, Alaska.

In addition, the special tax-exempt leasing rule involving Intelsat has been clarified to provide that taxpayers that operate through Intelsat will not obtain any tax benefits that they could not have obtained directly. A technical change to the tax-exempt leasing provisions of the bill also makes clear that a qualifying allocation of partnership items must meet the requirements of the bill over the entire period that a tax-exempt entity is a partner in a partnership. That is one of the tightening provisions.

TAX-EXEMPT BONDS

The modification contains several purely technical corrections to the provisions on manufactured housing under the mortgage credit certification program and the student loan bond provisions. In addition, the modification adds several projects to the list of projects in progress that are exempted from the IDB restrictions of the bill, including the Conagra project that Senator ZORINSKY has expressed concern, and several projects over which Senator CRANSTON has expressed concern. The modification also provides a clarification of the provisions enacted in 1982 restricting the use of IDB's for retail food facilities. The clarification provides that a retail food facility does not include a large scale catering facility. In addition, the bill provides that certain small issue IDB's used to acquire railroad trackage in connection with financing provided by the Federal Railroad Administration are not considered IDB's.

Finally, the modification contains a provision giving the Governor of Kentucky additional time to allocate the State's mortgage subsidy bond volume cap.

VOLUNTARY EMPLOYEES' BENEFICIARY ASSOCIATIONS (VEBA'S)

The modification conforms the VEBA legislation to what was intended by the Finance Committee. If the portion of the funded welfare benefits provided for key employees for 1 year exceeds 25 percent, then the organization will not be tax exempt. Also, in certain circumstances, if the benefit provided key employees is a facility, other than a facility used solely for dependent care or education, use of a tax-exempt entity to provide the facility will cause imposition of an excise tax on the key employees. The excise tax was intended to apply only to the use of certain facilities by key employees. It was not intended to apply to benefits such as health care or disability pay. This amendment corrects the provision by applying the excise tax on key employees when their use of certain facilities exceeds 25 percent.

EMPLOYEE STOCK OWNERSHIP PLANS (ESOP'S)

As originally offered, the amendment freezes at one-half of 1 percent the maximum tax credit for employer contributions to a tax credit ESOP. The Finance Committee intended to postpone, for 1 year, the scheduled increase in the maximum tax credit for employer contributions to tax credit

ESOP's. This amendment corrects the amendment and delays through 1985, the scheduled increase in the tax credit ESOP. The limit for contributions in 1986 and 1987 will remain at three-fourths of 1 percent.

DISTRIBUTIONS FROM IRA'S AND CERTAIN RETIREMENT PLANS

The modification would correct a technical error in a provision of the amendment which is intended to prevent IRA holders from incurring a penalty if distributions are not begun by age 70½. This belief is intended to apply only where the company which issued the IRA is prevented from making distributions as part of a rehabilitation proceeding under applicable State insurance laws.

The modification would also extend this relief to distributions pursuant to a qualified pension or profit-sharing plan under Internal Revenue Code section 401 or a retirement annuity under Internal Revenue Code section 403 since distribution requirements similar to those imposed under the IRA rules also apply to these types of distributions.

LIFE INSURANCE

There are a few technical changes to the amendment's life insurance provisions. A change to section 806 of the code as amended will prevent a company from treating its gains or losses attributable to a nonlife insurance business in a manner more favorable than a group of life and nonlife companies would be able to do if they filed consolidated returns. Another change limits to contracts issued by mutual insurance companies a transitional rule for determining reserves for certain guaranteed interest contracts. The third technical change makes it clear that nonlife insurance companies are entitled to the "fresh start" rules with respect to the life insurance products that they sell. An additional change clarifies the effective date for transitional rules for flexible premium contracts.

LEVERAGED STOCK PURCHASES AND DIVIDENDS FROM A REGULATED INVESTMENT COMPANY

The rules regarding leveraged stock purchases have been clarified where stock is held for only a portion of the period between dividend dates so that a potential loophole in the original amendment will be closed.

Also, the rule regarding the availability of a dividends received deduction with respect to dividends from a regulated investment company has also been clarified to permit payments to a regulated investment company to be treated as dividend income regardless of the 85 percent of taxable income limitation contained in Internal Revenue Code section 246(b).

CLARIFICATION OF CHANGE OF VENUE FOR CERTAIN TAX OFFENSES

The general venue provisions of Federal law allow prosecution in any judicial district where the offense was begun, continued, or completed. In the case of offenses involving the use of mail, prosecution is allowed in any judicial district from, through, or into which the mail moves. Under certain circumstances, a defendant is permitted to transfer venue to the district where he resides.

The amendment clarifies the change of venue provision by providing that a transfer of venue is required only when the sole basis for venue in a particular district is the receipt by the IRS of mailed materials. A technical drafting error may have limited a defendant's change of venue rights in cases other than those involving the use of the mail. The modification clarifies the committee's intent that a transfer of venue is required only when the sole basis for venue is the receipt of IRS mailed materials.

QUALIFICATIONS OF CERTAIN HOLDING COMPANY STOCK FOR INSTALLMENT PAYMENT OF ESTATE TAX

The correction to the provision amending section 6166 of the Internal Revenue Code to allow certain indirectly owned stock in an active business to qualify for installment payment of estate tax, will insure that appropriate cases where one level of indirect ownership, for instance, one holding company that directly owns an interest in the active business, is involved. The rule governing these cases where only one tier of ownership is pierced would be elective, and would require that 80 percent of the value of the holding company in the estate would have to consist of stock in the active business. If this rule is not elected, the general rule in the provision—requiring 20 percent of the value of each successive corporation that is looked through to have been owned by the decendent—would still apply.

This special rule for one-tier piercing is similar to a provision contained in H.R. 4170, reported by the Ways and Means Committee.

TITLE HOLDING COMPANIES

A technical change to section 865 of the amendment clarified the limits on selling or leasing property by a title holding company to a disqualified person with respect to that title holding company.

TAX CREDIT FOR RESEARCH

Technical changes to section 882 of the amendment makes it clear that the tax credit for qualified research is only available to corporations who are using or who will be using the results of such research in the active conduct of a trade or business. The changes also clarify how the credit will be calculated for certain partnerships and joint ventures, and include regulatory authority to provide that no amount of credit attributable to nonqualifying corporations in such partnerships can be allocated to other partners.

TRANSFERS OF PROPERTY OUTSIDE THE UNITED STATES

The rules regarding the transaction of transfers of property outside the United States have been modified to make clear that they apply to both the distributing corporation as well as a corporate shareholder in a complete liquidation.

PEER REVIEW ORGANIZATIONS

The modification makes it clear that self-insured employers, serving as board members, are not to be considered payer organizations in determining whether a prospective pro is eligible to contract with medicare during the current contracting period.

LABORATORY FEES

The modification makes it clear that those providers given exceptions to the rebundling provisions of TEFRA and prospective payment will continue to have their lab services for inpatients paid under part B. As a result of the modification, the fee schedule will not apply to tests furnished to inpatients of providers with section 602(k) waivers.

SOCIAL SECURITY COVERAGE FOR CHURCH EMPLOYEES

The election for certain religious organizations to treat their employees similarly to the self-employed for purposes of social security would be made available to organizations which were covered by social security prior to 1981, in addition to those which were not.

USE OF TAX RETURN INFORMATION VERIFYING ELIGIBILITY FOR BENEFIT PROGRAMS

The amendment clarifies the procedures to be followed by agencies in using Internal Revenue Service data on unearned income to verify eligibility for means-tested benefit programs. It requires agencies to independently verify information obtained from tax returns before benefits under any program are terminated or decreased.

Again, I would be happy to make a copy of this statement available to the Senator from Ohio, or anyone else who would like to look at it.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Would the manager of the bill not be willing to recognize that the amendment he has just offered is not a technical amendment? He has a right to offer, certainly, the amendment, and he has a modifying amendment. But he has referred to it as a technical amendment. In fact, if you look it over, it has a number of substantive provisions in it.

I certainly am not objecting to the offering of the amendment. You have the right to do it. But it is not technical in the sense that it just has no substantive effect. It has a number of facilities included that were not included before. It has some other provisions that you have already addressed yourself to.

The Senator from Ohio would respectfully suggest to the manager of the bill that the Senator from Kansas might more appropriately call this a modifying amendment, and not really a technical amendment, as such.

Mr. DOLE. If we do, it is technical in the sense that it contains primarily corrections plus transitional rules that a number of Senators asked me to make. In fairness to those Senators, we made that decision early on; that is, that we would make such transitional rules that met certain requirements.

From that standpoint, it may not be purely technical. I am willing to suggest that I have just modified the amendment. But for the most part, there are technical changes.

Mr. METZENBAUM. I thank the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Louisiana is recognized.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, the chairman of the committee has ably summarized the details of the amendment. I would like to review for the Senate some of the objectives that the committee sought to accomplish with this legislation.

Of course, our principal objective was to make a down payment on deficit reduction. The committee felt that the problem of large and growing Federal deficits required a balanced deficit reduction package that included tax increases as well as spending cuts.

The committee amendment contains a number of modifications in the medicare and medicaid programs which would reduce Federal spending. Even with these reductions, Federal medicare and medicaid spending will rise over this period, but by 5 percent less than under present law. As with previous budget measures, the committee sought to distribute the reductions in an evenhanded manner among hospitals, medicare beneficiaries, physicians, States and other recipients of medicare and medicaid funds.

The committee amendment also incorporates some changes in other areas of committee jurisdiction which will reduce Federal outlays. Altogether, if the Senate approves this bill, in combination with the bill passed last week, we will have reduced Federal spending by $30 billion between now and the end of 1987. This takes into account the interest savings that will result from revenue increases and direct reductions in spending programs.

It was our goal in committee to recommend revenue increases totaling $48 billion over 4 years. In order to meet that goal, we had to use a combination of four approaches.

First, we delayed certain tax cuts until the country could better afford them. For example, we extended the telephone excise tax beyond its present expiration date, and delayed for 3 years the time when taxpayers will be able to exclude a portion of interest income from taxation.

Second, we reduced the value of certain tax benefits of existing law, in cases where we felt we had to pare down the revenue cost of the benefits in view of our current deficit situation. When we are concerned with the deficits, it is difficult to choose which tax benefits should be reduced. Individual Senators might well make different choices on individual items to include or exclude. The committee deliberated at length on these issues, and the end result was an overall package that all of the committee members felt that they could support.

In most cases, the package would not eliminate tax benefits; instead, it would reduce the degree of the benefit. For example, the committee amendment would extend the depreciation period on real estate from 15 to 20 years, and increase the cutback on corporate tax preference items from 15 percent to 20 percent. In addition, the amendment would provide that the individual alternative minimum tax, which applies a 20-percent minimum tax rate to income over $40,000, would apply to salaries exempted by the foreign earned income exclusion. It would also require slower depreciation on property financed with tax-exempt industrial development bonds.

Third, we updated our tax system to handle complex transactions that are now producing unintended tax benefits. The Treasury Department was particularly helpful here in identifying areas where the tax system fails to take sufficient account of the time value of money, and where that failure is being exploited by tax shelter promoters to accelerate deductions, defer income, and provide inconsistent tax treatment between parties to a transaction. In response to these problems, the committee adopted a series of Treasury-recommended measures relating to interest accruals, deferred payments, and other accounting issues.

The committee also adopted other provisions designed to address complex transactions with unintended tax results. These other provisions include restrictions on tax-exempt entity leasing, extension of the tax straddle rules to stock options, and restrictions on the tax benefits available to persons entering into transactions with related persons. The committee amendment would also limit the rebate to Puerto Rico of distilled spirits taxes to taxes collected on imports of bona fide Puerto Rican rum production.

Finally, the committee amendment would raise the excise tax on distilled spirits. However, the committee included no other tax increase or significant new tax in this package.

While the tax provisions of the committee amendment are primarily dedicated to revenue raising, the Finance Committee also sought to accomplish additional goals. In particular, the committee worked to achieve several significant structural improvements in the tax law, to extend and expand certain incentives, and to reduce taxes for low-income families by increasing the earned income credit.

In the area of structural improvements, the committee became aware of several provisions that for tax policy reasons were in need of fundamental restructuring. In most of the cases, both the Treasury and the taxpayers were experiencing difficulty in working with the existing rules. For example, the committee amendment would establish a new, permanent system for taxing life insurance companies to replace a temporary, "stopgap" system enacted in 1982. In addition, the amendment would revise truck taxes to more closely reflect road usage, and would satisfy an administration request to change the form of the existing DISC trade program without changing the substance.

The committee amendment would extend and expand incentives for corporate investment in research, use of alternative energy sources, and the hiring of disadvantaged workers.

The committee amendment would also restructrue incentives for employee ownership in a way that would raise revenue over the budget period. The committee amendment incorporates a series of modifications in present law designed to encourage businesses to finance their growth in such a way that the employees who contribute to the growth will gain an ownership stake in the business as the growth occurs.

In addition, the committee amendment would provide more tax neutrality to the business owner facing the choice of selling out to a large public corporation, for example in a tax-free exchange of stock, versus selling to his employees. The amendment would also provide more tax neutrality to the business owner facing the choice of leaving part or all of his business to his family or charity, versus leaving part or all of it to his employees. Under current law, such business owners face a serious tax disadvantage when considering whether to transfer stock to employees. Under the committee amendment this tax bias against employee ownership would be reduced.

Although I am opposed to any postponement in increasing the tax credit for contributions to employee stock ownership plans, in light of the budget situation, the committee agreed with my suggestion to pay for the new employee ownership provisions by postponing for 1 year the scheduled increase in the payroll-based tax credit for ESOP's. As a result, the employee ownership provisions of the committee amendment would result in a net revenue gain of $400 million over the budget period.

Finally, the committee amendment would provide some tax relief for low-income taxpayers by increasing the earned income tax credit. These are the taxpayers who benefited least from the 1981 tax cuts while suffering the most from Federal spending cuts and payroll tax increases. This relief is appropriate and overdue.

To conclude, Mr. President, the committee amendment would deal with revenues primarily through updating the Tax Code to eliminate unintended results, moderating some existing tax benefits, and delaying some future tax cuts. It would also improve the tax system in several areas that need to be addressed for tax policy reasons, and would expand incentives in areas that are important to our country's economy.

Mr. President, my record is generally one of supporting tax cuts and opposing tax increases. However, I feel that our deficits are now so large that they must be reduced through revenue increases as well as spending cuts. I will support the committee amendment, and most likely other revenue increase proposals as well, if the revenue increases are balanced with spending cuts, and if the overall package reduces these enormous deficits. I hope that my colleagues will agree with me, and will support the committee's efforts.

Before I close, Mr. President, I would like to commend the chairman of the committee (Mr. DOLE) for his fairness to all members of the committee in handling this package. The provisions of the committee amendment were approved by a vote of 20 to 0 in committee. This shows that all members of the committee were given an opportunity to offer their provisions for committee consideration, and the amendment before the Senate reflects the contributions of all members of the committee. It was no easy task for the chairman to get the committee to put together this package, and he deserves full credit for his successful efforts.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Will the Senator withhold?

Mr. LONG. Yes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Will the manager of the bill, Mr. President, be good enough to respond to some questions?

Mr. DOLE. If I can.

Mr. METZENBAUM. The Senator has indicated that this bill raises $48 billion over a period of 3 years, as I understand it. My question of the Senator is, how much does it raise in total and then how much is lost by reason of this bill so that you get to a net of $48 billion.

Mr. DOLE. I think in total it would raise about $56 billion. We have about $8 billion worth of reductions. It is a good amendment through revenues.

Mr. METZENBAUM. And, as a matter of fact, you have to add to that that under the DISC program you had deferred taxes of $13.6 billion and under this bill those deferred taxes would be cancelled. So you lose about $21.6 billion, do you not?

Mr. DOLE. We will not be collecting that amount. I do not think we lose that $13 billion under DISC.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Why not? They have deferred taxes. When John Connally was Secretary of the Treasury and he came up and advocated this program which provided for employers of corporations that were exporting their products to get an 85-percent deferred tax credit—no, it was an 85-percent deferral, not a tax credit—he said at that time, and he emphasized, that it is a deferral, it is a deferral, it is a deferral.

Let me read the exact language. "And it has to be considered a deferral, not a loss. It is a deferral and not a loss."

The fact is that once this bill is enacted into law, there no longer will be that $13.6 billion that is owed to the Federal Government. It is one thing to defer taxes. What you are doing now is terminating. Therefore, this bill costs the taxpayers $21.6 billion, the $8 billion plus the $13.6 billion. Is that correct?

Mr. DOLE. I assume you can look at it in that way. But many of the benefits that add money to the bill also benefit taxpayers. For example the enterprise zone tax provisions, spousal IRS, the mortgage revenue bond extension, the industrial development bond restrictions are all of some benefit to taxpayers. I do have some of the same reservations the Senator from Ohio has on many of these programs.

On the so-called DISC $13.6 billion, it is my understanding, and I am certain we will get into that debate later on, it amounted to almost a permanent deferral so it would never have been collected in the first place.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Will the Senator from Kansas refer me to any evidence—any evidence—that there ever has been mentioned prior to this year the fact that those dollars would never be collected? We have searched the records and we find no evidence whatsoever that anybody has ever before proposed terminating the obligations of those corporations to pay that $13.6 billion. In one fell swoop you are giving away that much money.

So what you are really doing is you are raising $48 billion, or you are actually raising $56 billion, giving away $8 billion—whether some of them are justified or not, and I will address myself to whether they are or are not justified in the coming hours or days—and then in addition you have not included in there the $13.6 billion cancellation of the deferred taxes, meaning that this bill provides for only a net of $34.4 billion, not $48 billion. Nowhere do I know—and I would appreciate the managers of the bill telling me—has Congress ever before indicated that those tax-deferred funds would ever be totally forgiven.

Mr. DOLE. I understand the Senator from Ohio will have an amendment on that specific proposal. If he wants to bring that up now, we will be in a position to discuss it.

Mr. METZENBAUM. I am not quite ready to do that at the moment. I wanted to clarify the fact that what this bill does is it raises about $34 billion. It does not raise $48 billion. In addition, it raises an extra $8 billion because it gives away $8 billion.

I guess I have not made myself very clear on that. It raises $54 billion and gives away $8 billion, and then it gives away $13.6 billion. Of the $54 billion that it raises, a good deal of that or a fair amount of it actually comes from new taxes on liquor, an increased tax.

Mr. DOLE. That is $3 billion.

Mr. METZENBAUM. That is $3.7 billion for fiscal 1989, 36 cents a bottle. So I am going to tell all my constituents that when they buy a bottle of booze, the Finance Committee raised their price 36 cents a bottle.

Mr. DOLE. For the first time since 1951, if the Senator from Ohio will permit me, and half of the increase is in another bill.

Mr. METZENBAUM. We only put on a tax as a temporary measure and then pick up $4 billion by extending the telephone bill tax. The Lord only knows the telephone bills are high enough without continuing an increase in the telephone tax that had been put in place, I think, 3 years ago; $4 billion through 1989.

Mr. DOLE. I think in that area, we did not raise it; we just froze it at that level.

I remember that the 1982 tax bill, TEFRA, was a $100 billion package. In that package was the extension of the telephone tax and increasing the tax on cigarettes. I heard more commentary on those two items, which raised about $8 billion, than anything else in the $92 billion, because that is something that the media understand. They say a tax on cigarettes or a tax on liquor or a tax on telephones, because the other provisions are fairly complicated.

I think I said it is the committee. I said "I have heard more about the little things we did on excise taxes in 1982. All we want to do in this case is extend the excise tax on telephones."

We did not increase the tax on distilled spirits until the final hours of our discussion, when we still needed more revenue and could not find it anywhere. But it is an increase.

Mr. METZENBAUM. One way the Senator could have found it is by eliminating some of those new loopholes that we are going to be talking about. In that connection, I think maybe I just ought to recite some of my concerns about the bill at this point.

Mr. DOLE. If the Senator will yield for a moment, there is no doubt about it; we may create a few loopholes. But I remember asking the Treasury Secretary in the last week of our markup, I said, "We are running out of loopholes, will you send up some more loopholes to close?"

He said, "We do not have any more loopholes."

That was the Secretary's first indication. Maybe we have created some more.

Mr. METZENBAUM. I think the Senator asked me the same question, and I sent some additional ones via letter. There were some that maybe the Tresury Department would not agree to close, but there were some opportunities available.

Mr. DOLE. The joint committee staff and some of our staff went to a seminar in Philadelphia where they discussed tax loopholes. As I understand, there were a few, but it did not take too long. There were three loopholes, and we had one of them already closed.

We looked over Newsweek this week and everybody talks about loopholes. I guess the Senator from Ohio has some others. On the other hand, if we closed some of those loopholes, we would be out of business.

We have done a pretty good job, I think, in the last few years. Obviously, there is a great deal more to be done.

Mr. METZENBAUM. I point out the loophole in cattle feeding. I am not talking about farmers, I am talking about the syndicators.

Mr. DOLE. We corrected the syndicator problem.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Not according to the Treasury. The Treasury does not think we have done so.

Mr. DOLE. We shall get into those specific things. It is not that we did not make an effort to close most of them. I think the effort was there. Sometimes, if you do not have the votes, it is pretty hard to do.

Mr. METZENBAUM. I would urge the Senator to have his staff go back and look at that in conjunction with Treasury, because we are advised by Treasury that they do not think the committee went far enough in respect to cattle feeding.

Mr. DOLE. I shall be happy to take a look at that.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, we have before us today what purports to be the revenue side of the Reagan administration's downpayment on the deficit. It is quite a document—1,334 pages long. The statutory language alone weighs 2 pounds, 6 ounces. The companion document explaining the provisions of the bill adds another 1,010 pages and 2 pounds, 2 ounces of weight.

In terms of substance, Mr. President, this is not a very heavy document. This bill is a classic example of what is wrong with the priorities of this administration. It is a signal, a clear signal, that the Reagan administration and the Republican Senate are totally incapable of facing up to the consequences of the catastrophic failure of Reaganomics. This bill is proof positive that, in spite of the deficits, the special interest lobbyists are alive and well and carrying on business as usual.

This bill began as a praise-worthy attempt led by the chairman of the Committee on Finance to close unjustifiable tax loopholes. In all fairness, the bill does, in fact, make some major improvements in that area. But, Mr. President, while this legislation is closing loopholes with one hand, it is opening new ones with the other at a cost to the Treasury over the next 5 years of at least $15 billion. That is right, a $15 billion bigger deficit over the next 5 years by reason of the new loopholes.

What are the specifics, Mr. President? Well, I shall not recite all of them for you this afternoon, but as this debate rolls along, we shall address ourselves to them in detail. How about a $16 million safe harbor leasing deal for the Allis-Chalmers Corp.? Or how about a $70 million deal for oil companies in expanded percentage depletion allowances? Oh, the poor oil companies need those expanded depletion allowances. They are hurting so bad that they just cannot run fast enough to the Wall Street offices to buy up their competitors, they have so much money in the treasury.

Poor oil companies; $70 million more.

This bill includes $100 million in special tax breaks for the fish processing industry, and $745 million—three-quarters of a billion dollars, Mr. President—in giveaways to the watch and jewelry industry, $97 million in special breaks for car leasing companies. You could stand them up in line, all the special interest lobbyists who had all their special gimmicks that they wanted in this bill—special breaks for car leasing companies. Why?

Special breaks for the watch and jewelry industry, costing three-quarters of a billion dollars.

The bill contains special estate tax provisions to help specific families. In all fairness, these families are poor, these families need help; these families are the depressed people of this country. These families are really hurting. True, they are truly needy families like the Hunts of Texas and the Halls of Hallmark Cards—special provisions for them.

Oh, they have to take care of the needy of this country, and this bill takes care of them, and they are called the Halls and the Hunts.

This bill forgives the multinational corporations their obligation to pay deferred taxes under the DISC program that I have just mentioned in an exchange with the manager of the bill.

If our deficit situation were not so serious, some provisions of this bill would be downright funny. They are absolutely ludicrous. They are a joke upon the American people.

On page 589, for example, we find a provision which is easily understood by any average American. It reads as follows:

> Reduction in equity base for portion of equity allocable to life insurance business in noncontiguous Western Hemisphere countries.

Anybody can understand that—if you are a genius; and if you can understand what it is all about, you are much smarter than this Senator, I tell you.

What does it mean? Why the concern for noncontiguous as opposed to contiguous countries? You had to be a pretty smart lobbyist to figure out how to draft that one.

Is there such a word as "contiguosity"? I think, Mr. President, but I am not sure, that this is a tax break for one or more companies that insure the lives of individuals in certain Latin American countries where there exists a higher than usual risk of what has quaintly been called termination with extreme prejudice. But I am not sure. And I think that the Senate is entitled to have a full explanation of what that language means, because I cannot understand it. I doubt that the Presiding Officer of this body can understand it. I seriously doubt that the manager of the bill can understand it. And I am positive that the American people cannot understand it. But the smart tax lawyers and the tax lobbyists—they know what they wrote. They know that there is some special gimmick in there that they did not want to spell out so the rest of the American people and, yes, so the Senate and the Congress of the United States might understand what it is all about.

I am not sure what was meant when they talked about some of these provisions. On page 655, Mr. President, we find a provision that defines with great generosity—and listen to this—"the taxable income of a corporation domiciled in Alabama, Oklahoma, or Texas that acquired the assets of one or more insurance companies after 1979 and before April 1, 1983."

Now, is that not an amazing group of words to find in a tax bill? Is it not unusual that you should find a corporation domiciled in Alabama, Oklahoma, or Texas that acquired the assets of one or more insurance companies after 1979 and before April 1, 1983, should be given special privileges, special tax advantages under the laws of our country?

I believe that Alabama, Oklahoma, and Texas are three of the very finest States in the Union. I have no quarrel with them. I am sure these three States are home of some equally fine insurance companies. I have no quarrel with insurance companies domiciled in those States, but what in the world is this provision all about? Who benefits? And above all, what is such a provision doing in this bill at a time when the taxpayers of this country are saddled with a national debt of $1.4 trillion?

Mr. President, it is hard to find all the gimmicks in this bill. It is hard to be able to understand them when you find them. We are not tax experts. We are Senators. We do not deal in this field. When you give us some of this gobbledygook language, we have difficulty in comprehending what its impact will be. And I here and now call upon those who are managing this bill to explain some of these provisions to the rest of us in the Senate. I for one cannot understand it.

I know that I can read and find at least 33 new loopholes in the legislation which was advertised as a loophole closer, as a down payment on the deficit, as the Reagan administration's great hoopla answer to how to balance the budget. But I point out, if we want to make a real down payment, then we ought to begin by striking from this bill each and every provision that reduces Federal revenues.

But even if we do that, we will not succeed in doing much more than putting a small dent in an overwhelming problem. What must be done, Mr. President, and what the administration is loathe to do in this election year, is to admit that the 1981 tax bill was a catastrophic mistake, a measure that has all but destroyed the Federal revenue pace.

Now, I speak about the 1981 tax bill with a good deal of embarrassment because, I must confess, I voted for it, and I am frank to say I regret that vote more than any other I have cast since I came to the Senate. I was taken in. It was my fault. I should not have voted for it.

The 1981 tax bill is the cause of our budget deficits. In 1981, we enacted the Economic Recovery Tax Act and lost $1.1356 trillion through fiscal year 1988. To put it another way, it was $1,135 billion through fiscal year 1988 that we lost by that tax bill.

In 1982, we recognized our mistake and we recouped $254 billion through fiscal year 1988 by enacting the Tax Equity and Fiscal Responsibility Tax Act. The net loss to the Treasury from the President's program from fiscal year 1981 to fiscal year 1988 including the Highway Revenue Act is $860 billion.

Now, the President's fiscal year 1982 budget, which included the President's tax cut proposal, has failed to deliver on its promises. The fiscal year 1982 budget promised that revenues as a percentage of GNP would not fall below 19.3 percent. The fact is in fiscal year 1983 they will be 19 percent; in 1984, 18.7 percent; 18.7 in 1985; 18.5 in 1986; 18.4 in 1987, and 18.3 in 1988. The fiscal year 1982 budget promised that revenues would increase through fiscal year 1986 reaching $940 billion. The facts are that under current law revenues will total not $940 billion, only $768 billion by fiscal year 1986 or a $171 billion shortfall in 1 year.

It is clear, Mr. President, that the President's tax cut program went too far, that it is in fact largely responsible for our mammoth budget deficits. In December 1981, 16 Republican Senators wrote to President Reagan to express their concern about the decline in corporate tax revenues. "We are gravely concerned," said these 16 Republican Senators, "that by 1985 as many as half of all corporations may be paying no corporate taxes at all." I commend my colleagues for their foresight. They were right to be concerned, and if anything the causes for concern are even greater today than they were when the letter was written.

Consider what has happened. In the 1950's and 1960's, corporate taxes provided a quarter of all Federal revenues. In the 1970's, that figure fell to a still substantial 15 percent. Last year, thanks to the 1981 tax bill, corporations contributed only 6.6 percent of the total, down from 25 percent in the 1950's and 1960's.

In industry after industry the pattern is clear. In 1982, the chemical industry paid a negative tax rate of 17.7 percent. Negative, what does that mean? Negative means a refund of 17.7 percent. The chemical industry received $211 million in refunds or write-offs to reduce future tax bills. The aerospace industry paid taxes at a negative rate of 6.6 percent. The telecommunications industry paid at a high rate, a positive rate, a whooping 1.6 percent, and the railroads, who are making money, paid 4.1 percent. The average for all corporations was 16.1 percent. There are millions of hard-working Americans who would jump at the chance to pay taxes at the rate of 1 or 4 or 8 or even 16 percent. When the President of the United States says that there is equity in his programs, says that he is fair to all the people of this country, let him explain to the people of this country why average taxpayers are paying 20 and 25 and 30 and 35 and 40 percent and the largest corporations of this country are getting refunds or paying at a 1.6-percent rate or a 4.1-percent rate.

The average working people will not have the chance to pay a lower rate. They do not know about tax shelters. They do not know about energy tax credits. They do not know about all the special gimmicks that we here in Congress do, to see to it that those with the high-paid lobbyists get theirs and the rest of the people pay the tax burden of this country. The average Americans, their children and their grandchildren will pay the price for the total bankruptcy of supply-side economics, and that has begun already.

Our last tax go-round included a highly regressive tax on tobacco. Today, we have before us a bill that pays for new giveaways by retaining the telephone tax, which was otherwise due to expire, and increasing the tax on alcohol.

Is it not an interesting contrast that the taxes that have been deferred to the extent of $13.6 billion on certain large international corporations are now to be forgiven under this bill—canceled, wiped out, no further obligation—but the tax law that provided that the telephone tax would be for only a certain period of time and then expire is going to be extended?

Is not that fair, Mr. President? This time when I say "Mr. President," I mean the President of the United States. Is it not fair, Mr. President of the United States, that those who pay the telephone taxes are going to have to continue to pay those telephone taxes, and those who owe $13.6 billion to the Federal Government are going to have it canceled, wiped out? That is equity. That is fairness.

The average Americans do not have any lobbyists here to speak for them. The largest corporations in this country have the highest paid lobbyists.

I predict, here and now, that if Ronald Reagan wins a second term, we will be on the floor next year debating stiff consumption taxes on middle-income Americans. There is no need to speculate about the future. The fact is that, thanks to Reaganomics, the average American taxpayer is already bearing an unfair share of the tax burden.

When the House Ways and Means Committee instituted the current income tax structure back in 1913, it wrote: "The tax upon incomes is levied according to ability to pay. It would be difficult to devise a fairer tax."

Back in January 1963, 50 years after the current income tax structure was instituted, Ronald Reagan said: "The entire (graduated income tax) structure was created by Karl Marx. It has no justification in getting Government needed revenue."

Of course, no President should be held to a statement he made long ago. But, given the tax policies this President has put forward, I honestly wonder whether his views have changed that much over 21 years. No administration in history has done more than this one to subvert and undermine the basic principle of fairness in our tax code.

Corporate loopholes aside, the President's tax program is probably the most regressive and biased change in individual income tax ever imposed on the American people. No matter how you measure it—in dollars, percent of tax reduction, or as a percent of income—the rich get richer and the poor get poorer under this administration.

Federal, State, and local taxes on families in the bottom 20 percent of the economy have gone up from 9.7 percent of income in 1979 to nearly 12 percent in 1984. By contrast, the richest families saw their average taxes or percentage of income decline in real terms.

The CBO released a report on April 2, and it puts this issue of fairness in the sharpest focus to date. When CBO measured the effect of the ERTA and TEFRA tax laws, it discovered that those with incomes of less than $10,000 had their taxes reduced, on average, $30 from 1982 to 1985. Those with incomes of $80,000 and over, however, had their tax burden reduced, on average, $29,840 in a comparable period of time.

Of course, the President refuses to admit that his tax proposals benefit the rich. When asked to respond to this charge in his Washington Post interview in January, he replied:

> No, as a matter of fact, that again is a distortion, that our tax program gave the breaks to the rich.

With all due respect, the President is either misinformed or he is willfully misleading the American people, because his answer does not conform with the facts.

The CBO report also highlights the impact on American families of the President's tax cuts and his budget cuts, and it is here that we see the full extent of the inequity which is at the heart of what we know as Reaganomics.

Taking tax cuts and budget cuts together, American families with less than $10,000 in income suffered a net loss of $270 in 1983, $390 in 1984, $440 in 1985, for a total loss of $1,100 over that 3-year period.

American families with incomes of $80,000 and over had a net gain of $7,070 in 1983, $8,270 in 1984, and $8,930 in 1985—for a total gain of $24,270. That is a lot of figures, but let me summarize. Those with incomes of less than $10,000 suffered loss of $1,100 over the 3-year period, while those with incomes of $80,000 and over gained $24,270.

Is this fairness? Is it true that this program does not benefit the wealthy? I do not know how the President was able to answer: "No, as a matter of fact that again is a distortion, that our tax program gave the breaks to the rich."

The President is wrong. He was wrong. I submit to him that it is time that he go back and look at the facts. Is this the trickle-down theory they talk about, about making the rich richer and it will trickle down to the poor? No, it looks to me more like the biggest redistribution of wealth in American history—from poor households, which represent 24 percent, to rich households, which represent only 1.6 percent of the people in our country.

What about the middle class? Families earning between $10,000 and $20,000 gain a grand total of $160 over 3 years, once the tax cuts and budget cuts are combined. That is right—the munificent sum of $160, or $53.33 a year.

Keep in mind that the CBO report did not include increased social security taxes or increased State and local taxes.

In their "Economic Outlet Report" of February, the CBO states:

> States and local governments have raised taxes. The increases in 1983 were the largest on record, perhaps equal to half the 1983 installment of the Federal personal income tax cut.

The Federal Government cut back on revenues to help the States pay their share of the public's bills, the costs of running the States' government, and then the States had to raise taxes, and low- and middle-income wage earners wound up again paying the burden.

Once higher social security taxes, local taxes, and State taxes are added in, the middle class ends up on the short end of the stick. But what else is new?

Even if we take the most benign view, the President's tax and budget polices have been of marginal benefit to the middle-class Americans.

Let us look at what the misguided polices of this administration have done to our country.

In 1960, the national debt was $280 billion.

It was up to $500 billion in 1975, which included paying for the Vietnam war.

But Ronald Reagan is not a little leaguer.

By the end of 1984, he will have added $692 billion to the debt by running the largest deficits in history.

How much is that? The figure is almost impossible to comprehend.

Think of it as $9,000 in debt for each and every household in this country.

Or think of it as Time magazine did in the issue of March 5, 1984.

> In a speech unveiling his economic program soon after he took office, Reagan dramatized his concern about the national debt, then approaching $1 trillion, by noting that it would take a stack of $1,000 bills 67 miles high to equal that total. When he brought out his new budget this month, Reagan failed to mention that this deficit would push the debt to $1.8 trillion by next year and raise his stack of $1,000 bills to more than 120 miles.

In his state of the Union address in 1983, Ronald Reagan said:

> The deficits we face are not rooted in defense spending nor is the deficit, as some would have it, rooted in tax cuts.

Back in February, I asked the CBO to provide me with the deficits we would be facing if the President's tax program—all his tax cuts and tax increases—had never taken place. In other words, what would our deficits be if pre-1981 tax law had remained in place?

The figures are truly startling. This year we would be facing a deficit of $73 billion, $56 billion in fiscal year 1985, $20 billion in fiscal year 1986, and a surplus—yes, a surplus—of $19 billion in fiscal year 1987.

How can the President claim his tax cuts are not a major cause of these deficits? These are supply-side deficits, rooted directly in what GEORGE BUSH once called voodoo economics.

Sure, the President can point to the recovery. But let us not forget the facts.

Since the Reagan administration came to office, real GNP has increased only about 4 percent, that is an average annual growth of a little over 1 percent.

Unemployment reached a postwar record level of 10.8 percent, and we still have a million more Americans unemployed than we did when the President took office.

Industrial capacity is still being utilized at a lower rate than when the President took office.

Business failures are still running at twice the rate they were when the President took office.

We have 34 million Americans living in poverty—5 million more than when the President took office.

Yes, things have recently gotten better. But let us not confuse recovery with progress. Real per capita GNP increased only $87 in the first 3 years of the Reagan administration—hardly the economic miracle expected of the President's supply-side tax policy.

And what of the future?

Contrary to what many Americans believe, the fastest growing item in the budget is not defense spending—or welfare, or food stamps, or any other social program.

It is debt service—$164 billion in fiscal year 1985.

How big an item is that?

$164 billion, the cost of the debt service in 1985, would pay for: all Federal medical programs, including medicare, medicaid, disease prevention, research and training, plus food stamps, AFDC, SSI, and unemployment compensation.

And at the end, we would have $13 billion in loose change remaining.

Felix Rohatyn wrote recently that the Reagan administration "is playing Russian roulette with the economy."

He is absolutely right.

And we are truly fortunate that we have not as yet hit upon the loaded chamber.

It is time to act—to act with a sense of urgency.

We can begin by stripping the bill before us today of its revenue-losing provisions.

But there are other actions we can and should be taking.

Over the years the special interests have successfully lobbied for tax subsidy after tax subsidy. Today the tax code is this Nation's most massive entitlement program. It provides billions and billions of dollars in subsidies to some of this Nation's most profitable corporations.

Since the current administration assumed office, Congress has made a thorough review of every direct spending program. And truly drastic cuts have been made. The President would have the American people believe that Congress has been irresponsible and that Congress has been a runaway spender. But the fact is that Congress has provided for a total $389 billion taken from social programs between the 1982 and 1988 fiscal years and nearly $500 billion by the end of the decade. Congress has met its responsibility.

But we have not undertaken that same detailed and exacting review of tax subsidy programs.

We have cut medicaid and medicare. But we have not reviewed the appropriateness of revenue bonds or research and development credits for pharmaceutical companies.

We have cut employment and training programs. But we have not thoroughly reviewed the effectiveness of the targeted jobs credit.

We have reduced housing aid for the poor and the elderly. But we have not paid the same attention to the interest deduction for vacation homes.

We have reduced our commitment to weatherization and to low income energy assistance programs. But we have not reviewed tax subsidies for oil and gas producers.

If we are truly serious about reducing deficits, we need to look at more than one budget.

We have the direct Federal budget—the one that contains Federal revenues and direct expenditures.

But there is another Federal budget—an indirect budget that includes public subsidies for a vast range of activities.

Some items in the second Federal Budget are clearly in the public interest.

One of those is the mortgage interest deduction for homeowners. A provision that has enabled millions of Americans to purchase their own homes. And over the years, it has created millions of jobs in the home construction industry. I support that.

Tax subsidies that encourage retirement savings are clearly in the public interest. If we enable individuals to be financially independent at retirement age, we reduce the future costs of Federal programs. And these proposals increase the savings pool, providing badly needed capital.

We have a right to explore, as we will in this bill, the extent to which that kind of a program should be taken and how it should go, but certainly the whole concept of providing retirement savings for those as they grow older makes good sense.

But, I do not find the remotest public policy justification for a number of the other tax subsidies in the second Federal budget.

One of the least defensible of all is a half billion dollar a year tax entitlement for the timber industry.

Since 1943, the timber industry has had a tax entitlement that permits them to treat the sale of timber as a capital gain. This means that instead of paying a tax rate on their profits as high as 46 percent they need only pay 28 percent.

In testimony before the Senate Finance Committee, Assistant Secretary of the Treasury John Chapoton characterized timber as "one of the most tax favored of domestic industries." He pointed to the capital gains treatment of timber, observing that profits received by manufacturers and producers of every other product are taxed at ordinary rates. And he pointed out that the timber industry receives a 10-percent tax credit and rapid depreciation for reforestation expenses.

The farmers of my State of Ohio, when they make a profit from growing corn, wheat, or soybeans, pay their taxes at ordinary tax rates. But those who grow timber, which is planted in the same manner as other crops, are allowed to treat their profits as capital gains.

It is deeply ironic, Mr. President, that timber growers enjoy preferential tax treatment even when they cut on Federal lands—a subsidy for having taken no risk at all.

The distinguished chairman of the Finance Committee was looking for other loopholes to close. Let me point out to him that the timber industry loophole is an excellent one, worth about a half-billion dollars a year.

I do not believe that there is any justification for continuing to subsidize the timber industry.

But timber is far from the only candidate.

Banks and other financial institutions today enjoy a tax subsidy that will cost the American taxpayers $4.2 billion through 1988.

In 1981 this Nation's 20 largest banks paid only $53 million in taxes on profits of $1.9 billion.

That is a tax rate of 2.7 percent. And in 1982, they paid a negative 2.8 percent—in other words, they got a refund—2.8 percent on earnings of $1.4 billion.

I suggest to the distinguished chairman of the Finance Committee, if he is looking for loopholes, look a little further at those banks.

Part of the reason for this low effective tax rate is a tax subsidy known as the artificial bad debt deduction. Since 1951 the banks have enjoyed this special treatment. No other business has it.

If other businesses have bad debts, they write them off. But under this special entitlement, banks and other financial institutions are permitted to compute and deduct amounts far in excess of their actual losses.

I might point out parenthetically that the Finance Committee knew that banks exist because they saw fit to provide some additional benefits in connection with this particular piece of legislation, as I understand it, having to do with the ESOP program. We will get to that issue at an appropriate time.

How can we defend a billion dollar annual subsidy for an industry that earns billions in profits and pays so little in taxes?

And how can we do so now?

The bank bad debt deduction cannot be justified. It should be repealed.

Insurance is another of the Nation's specially favored industries. As the result of numerous special tax provisions, some of which go back as far as 1921, the six largest insurance companies were by 1981 paying an effective tax rate of only 13 percent. And in 1982, the industry paid a negative—in other words, they got a refund—of 6.3 percent. What does this bill do about that? This bill will cut the life insurance industry tax bill by $2.5 billion through fiscal year 1989.

My good friend, the chairman of the Finance Committee, was saying he would show us some more loopholes. We are talking about them right now, Mr. President.

In addition, Mr. President, I wonder why it is that we are subsidizing the oil industry to the tune of $28 billion through 1988.

In recent years, the major oil companies of this country have used their profits to buy real estate and department stores, to enter the office equipment and newspaper businesses, and to gobble up coal, uranium, and solar energy companies. Now, their feeding frenzy has turned them upon one another.

Why should the American taxpayer continue to subsidize these highly profitable companies? We provided all sorts of tax advantages to the oil companies so that they could go out and drill more oil. Why do we not take them away from them now if we are looking for revenue, since they are not using that money for drilling but they are only now drilling in the Wall Street offices of the other oil companies of this country.

I think it is time to take another look at the entire list of special tax entitlements. We should do to the hidden Federal tax budget what has already been done to direct spending. And until we start to do that, Mr. President, we have no right to tell the American people that we are serious about the country's economic house being in order. We have a responsibility to find those areas where there is no tax equity; where there are tax loopholes that benefit the few and penalize the many.

This bill provides too many new loopholes and fails to close some of those that presently exist. I hope that, as we continue our debate on this measure, we will have an opportunity to address ourselves to a number of these loopholes.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I have listened carefully to the Senator from Ohio, who will be debating some of these areas. I do not think it would serve any real purpose to try to refute each statement. Obviously, he disagrees with the Reagan administration. I noted that right off. And that is certainly a right that the Senator has and one that will be debated between now and November.

But it is our hope in the Finance Committee, where we had unanimous support for this amendment, that we could go ahead and at least make this little installment on the downpayment and then put together the balance of the package.

Obviously, the Senator from Ohio and others who disagree with the work of the Finance Committee have a right to offer amendments. We would like to start that amendment process immediately. So I hope that Senators who have amendments or would like to make statements on the bill would cooperate with us.

There has been some indication that if we cannot finish this this week, we can finish it next week, which would make a lot of sense to this Senator, because we are going to be running out of days in April.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum. But I hope that Members could start offering amendments or praise for the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The Senator from Ohio is recognized.

AMENDMENT NO. 2903

(Purpose: To eliminate revenue loss from tax free employee rewards)

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I send to the desk my amendment and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Ohio (Mr. METZENBAUM) proposes an amendment numbered 2903.

On page 986, beginning on line 18 strike out all of section 828 of the amendment (dealing with employee achievement awards).

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio is recognized.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, this might be properly called the jewelry industry amendment. Section 828 of this bill ought to win an award. In fact, it is allegedly about awards of jewelry such as rings, badges, pens, desk sets, pins, watches, and the like to employees for recognition of accomplishments on the job.

It is commendable for an employer to recognize, and award, an employee for such achievements as length of service, productivity, and workplace safety. Tens of thousands of employers do that today without the rich rewards of this proposed new loophole.

That is why section 828 deserves an award all its own. It is the tax loophole motherlode for the jewelry industry. It creates a new three-quarters of a billion dollar increase in the budget deficit without any real justification, and unaccountably it manages to channel the rewards from this three-quarters-of-a-billion-dollar giveaway to just one industry—the jewelry industry.

Mr. President, employee awards are a traditional and accepted form of an employer showing an employee that she or he has been doing a good job. A watch for longevity, a ring for reaching a sales goal, a desk set to go with the new promotion, a pin with the company's emblem to promote a new product design, even a beer mug with the company's seal, when the softball team wins a league championship—these are part of tradition. But this amendment goes way beyond a cost-of-living increase in the deduction for employee gifts. This is a three-quarters-of-a-billion-dollar bonanza for the jewely industry. It raised in my mind some very basic questions of budget policy, tax fairness, and good employee-employer relations.

This amendment would allow an employer to give an employee—how much do you think? $100? $200? $400? $800? $2,000? $3,000? $4,000?—$4,800 in gifts in 1 year deductible to the employer and nontaxable for the employee for achievements in productivity, length of service, or retirement, and job safety.

Let me say that $4,800 buys quite a nice gift.

Let me also say that $4,800 in gifts to one employee is an enormous increase over current law in this matter, law which seems to be working pretty well.

As I understand the present law, if an employer gives an individual employee a gift, the maximum that he can deduct is $25. But, if he has a plan which would be provided for with respect in comparison to the $4,800 figure, he can get up to $400. That is not too bad—$400 would seem to make some sense. That does not seem to be out of line. I am a realist. There has been some inflation. I guess the inflation rate today is about 5 percent. So I suppose somebody could tell me how $400 gets up to $4,800 except as one sweet bill for the jewelry industry.

Can you believe it? The jewelry industry wants to be able to sell their jewelry to the employees so the employers can tax deduct it and give it to their employees costing the Federal Treasury $750 million through 1989. The American taxpayers are going to subsidize it. How can anybody justify $4,800 in jewelry gifts? It is not even limited to one time. He can do it over a period of time. You can do it more than once.

I have never met an employer who said to me: "Gee, I would like to give my employee, Joe Smith, a nice, new watch to thank him for his help this year but I cannot because of the tax laws. I really want to give him a $4,800, 18-karat gold, sapphire dial watch but the tax laws will not permit me to do so."

No. I do not think that any of us ever met that employer, and I do not think that we ever will.

It is my opinion that the legitimate businesses and corporations of this country have not been the ones who have come forth and urged the adoption of this amendment. This is strictly an amendment for the jewelry industry. The fact of the matter is that this amendment, limited as it is to gifts of jewelry, is not at all about better employee-employer relations or about fair employee incentive plans. There are lots of other ways to encourage and express appreciation of employees, such as stock option plans, trips, scholarships for their children, even bonuses that are not considered by this amendment.

Mr. President, this is a precisely targeted, 24-karat gold windfall for the jewelry industry, and it is a $745 million increase in the Nation's deficit. If the proponents of this amendment are really concerned about helping employees, let us not talk about jewelry, pen and pencil sets. Let us talk about sending employees back to college to learn new skills, or sending their children to college to help educate a new generation in new technical and service areas, or in a host of other areas of benefits that can be provided employees.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, would my good colleague yield?

Mr. METZENBAUM. I yield.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, I agree about the return to college. May I invite the attention of those that the able Senator from Ohio appeals to for such education, to come to Salem College in Salem, W. Va. It is the town in which I was born, and the college from which I graduated. There they will receive the training that he believes they need.

Mr. METZENBAUM. I thank my distinguished colleague from West Virginia.

We talk about plans for helping employees. We talk about improving employee health insurance plans, $4,800 would go pretty far in adding dental coverage or mental health benefits. But a fancy watch? He can buy an awful lot of jewelry for $4,800.

Let us talk about helping an employee buy a new car. That would help all of American industry because the auto industry impacts upon so much of the rest of the American industries, steel, glass, timber, and so much more. Let us talk about employees adding the new rooms to their homes to help the housing industry, or buying a new stove or refrigerator.

We can talk about a host of areas. But who had the audacity to come forward with this idea for $4,800 in jewelry? In jewelry?

This is the most audacious proposal I have seen in a long time.

Mr. GARN. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. METZENBAUM. Not yet.

But let us not just talk about one kind of industry, the jewelry manufacturing industry, and let us not talk about three-quarters of a billion dollar chunks added to the deficit.

I will say to my colleague from Utah I will be finished in a moment and be happy to yield.

Employer-employee relations are getting better in this country. People are pulling together. Productivity is increasing and time off the job is decreasing. This amendment is unnecessary, unaffordable and unfair to the employees it purports to help.

As a matter of fact, I would guess if you went out and talked to the working people of this country and said to them that this afternoon the U.S. Senate is considering an amendment to make it possible for employers to give their employees $4,800 in jewelry, almost to a man or woman they would respond and say, "Are you out of your head? If you have $4,800 to give away that is going to be tax exempt as well, why do you not give us a little extra money in our payroll check so we can take it home and feed the family or help send our kids to college, or let me catch up on the mortgage payments that are overdue? $4,800 in jewelry? I would not know what to do with that much jewelry if you gave it to me."

I do not know what the aegis is for this amendment. I do know what my appraisal of its merit is. That is not very high.

Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. GARN addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah.

Mr. GARN. Mr. President, I did not anticipate this matter would come up. I heard that this item was on the list of the Senator from Ohio to attack. I thought when the bill started at 1, I would put in a call to him and discuss this amendment with him. What I heard described over the last 2 or 3 minutes I have been on the floor was certainly not the intent. Let us not talk about nebulous people. It was my amendment. Let us not talk about something for the jewelry manufacturers. The jewelry manufacturers can already deduct certain amounts under a qualified plan. I want to stress that.

Some of the fears that have been expressed about what has been the practice for 2 or 3 years now are that you could play games with jewelry and give the president or the chief executive and the vice presidents special awards in the form of jewelry, watches, service pins, and so on. I do not know how salable they are, anyway. If you get a pin, if you serve 35 years and you get a 35-year pin, I do not know who you sell it to with the company name on it, or a watch that has been inscribed "Congratulations to Joe Blow for 35 years of dedicated service." If he wants to pawn it, I guess he can scrape the inscription off.

In any event, it was carefully worded originally that they had to be qualified plans. In other words, if you set up a production award pin, or a service pin, a safety award for 5 years without getting your hand cut off or something, that applied to the janitor as well as the President of the corporation. So you could not play games with the Internal Revenue code and say, "Well, we will award the rich boy, the high salaried, the white collar workers." So it has to be a qualified plan to give these awards.

The thing that disturbed me and got me on this a year and a half ago had nothing to do with the jewelry manufacturers. It was a matter of IRS talking about regulations to implement the taxation of these to the recipient. In other words, a man could work for 50 years for an organization, and you give him a gold watch for his dedicated and faithful service, or 20 years of safety or production, whatever, under a qualified plan, and you are going to tax it. You are going to say, "Hey, fellow, you have to pay taxes on that."

So I tried to work with IRS to say, "This is ridiculous, absolutely ridiculous. You never taxed these before and now you are going to for most people, not the rich ones in a company but the ones who have worked long and hard for traditional awards. This has been traditional."

There happens to be a Senate pin. I do not wear mine because I lost the back of it. I do not know who wants to wear it anyway. We give pins under a similar plan here in the Senate for length of service to the U.S. Senate. This has long been the case in this country.

I do not think that has anything to do with safety in the workplace or any other types of things. I would agree with the Senator from Ohio, businesses in this country can do a great deal more for their employees. But what we are talking about are these qualified plans to reward safety, production, length of service, and that is all.

That has always gone on. It is not new. All that was new is that IRS put out some proposed regulations that they were going to tax them. I would think of all people the Senator from Ohio is on this floor often defending the little people of this country. That is why I thought I could talk with him before he got the floor and ask, "Do you really realize the intent of this amendment? It is to tell IRS to keep their hands off somebody's 35 year pin or retirement pin or their gold watch."

I could not work this out with the IRS so I put in an amendment. I have been through the most frustrating experience with the staff of the Senate Finance Committee and the staff of the Treasury Department over a very small amendment that I thought was motherhood, absolutely motherhood. Do not tax these poor people for their 15-year production award or 35 years of valuable service. Most of them are probably retired anyway and could not affort to pay the taxes.

Then I started hearing the revenue estimates. I has heard all the way up to $300 million, or $780 million, whatever the Senator from Ohio said it was. I have fought with people over these revenue estimates, and I defy them to tell me how something that has never been taxed in the history of this country can cause a $700 million or a $1 billion or a $300 million loss in revenue to the Treasury. If they want to be honest about it and say, "If we taxed these it would be additional revenue and we are losing additional revenue we could gain by taxing these," that would be one thing, but it simply is not a fair statement by the staff of Treasury, the Senate Finance Committee, or the Senator from Ohio to indicate that something that has never been taxed we are losing revenue on, only prospectively. It is certainly not retroactively or currently. Nobody that I know of has ever had to pay a tax on their retirement pin.

They did not try to get me when the Senate gave me a pin for becoming a U.S. Senator. It says, "United States Senator" on it. Every one of us have been given one. Nobody has said, "I had to pay taxes on it or declare it."

I also want to say I do not particularly like this amendment. My original language was quite different. If the Senator does not like this one, he would not like mine because the staff changed it so dramatically it defeated what I was trying to accomplish. They brought in all kinds of red herrings about TV sets and other types of awards that could come under this. The amendment I submitted had nothing to do with all of those.

I could see how it could be expanded, so we started out with qualified plans, as I have stated. It had to be a qualified plan so you could not discriminate against the janitor compared to the CEO.

Also, it had to be very carefully construed so it could not be expanded beyond these traditional types of awards I am talking about, so you did not give somebody a TV set or something that really had some value. The things I was talking about may have been expensive because the price of gold went up and the diamond that went into the 50-year pin had gone up dramatically. It seemed insane to me to tax people on those types of things that had no value to anybody else. There was no way to turn it into cash to help you. You could not use it to ride an airplane for free or use it for tuition. I have been in the battle for over a year and a half, and I cannot believe what I tried to accomplish from what I have heard about this amendment.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. GARN. I would be happy to yield.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Is it my understanding that the Senator never intended to get this figure up to $4,800, and only tried to change the $400 figure presently in the law with respect to qualified plans?

Mr. GARN. This is the first time I have ever heard $4,800, because we are talking about $400 and four times during a career, which got up to $1,600. So the $4,800 is a new one. It is the first time I have heard that.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, let me point out to the Senator that in the 1,000-page booklet we were all given, we find what reads as follows: it talks about, "i.e., an aggregate maximum of $4,800 if the employee receives awards deductible up to $1,600 for each of the three achievement categories." So the $4,800 is a figure we picked up from the bill.

Mr. GARN. I understand how they are arriving at that now. That is a hypothetical situation. To expect that any single employee would ever receive the maximum award in all three categories, I do not know how that would ever happen. Plus, if you look at the revenue estimates, I do not understand how if something is not taxed, it could be a respective revenue loss. Like everything else, if we increase tax, we gain more revenue. But if you have not had a tax on a particular thing, you have not lost revenue.

Mr. METZENBAUM. My figure comes again from the report.

Mr. GARN. I understand, Mr. President. I am talking about the practicalities of it. Frankly, I was caught unawares. I do not have even my amendment with me or the figures in the original amendment. I do not know where a lot of these revenue estimates came from. What we found with the $300 million revenue estimate I heard about, they were assuming that every employee, something like 50 percent of all the people, would receive these in the country. Then they would receive the maximum award of $400. We got checking and found out the average value of these pins is about $40. So even if it were revenue lost, the figures they have used in the assumptions just are not in the realm of reality or practicality that would take place.

Mr. METZENBAUM. I am trying to get what the thrust is of what the Senator from Utah is attempting to do; perhaps he could figure out an amendment that would be acceptable to him in the Finance Committee that would not go to the extent that this amendment goes. But I am not quite sure I know the objective of the Senator from Utah.

Mr. GARN. I shall try once more. As I thought I was explaining rather clearly, my objective was to prevent, in the traditional types of awards—production, service, safety awards, retirement awards and qualified plans from the recipient of those—the retiree, that person who got the 25 year pin and so on, from having to pay a tax on it.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Why not just say that, that retirement awards, which I think go up to $400——

Mr. GARN. Then we got into a big argument on how you define traditional. Believe me, after a year and a half, I cannot solve this problem talking to the Senator on the floor about how we write that. I thought in my amendment that was offered originally and modified by the Senate Finance Committee that we had covered all these bases, very narrowly construed the amendment to apply to what I was trying to accomplish.

If the Senator would like somehow to defer this amendment to give us time to see if we can work it out with staff and come up with what I am trying to accomplish, I would certainly be willing to try. I have spent a year and a half of my life trying to protect some retiree or some recipient of a 35-year pin. I am amazed at the $730 million estimate of revenue loss on something that has never been taxed in this country.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, it is not the fault of the Senator from Utah or the fault of the Senator from Ohio. It is all the fault of the manager of the bill. Will he tell us how we got into this situation, because all the Senator from Utah wants to do is make the recipient of the pin or award a nontaxable receipt?

Mr. GARN. Or a gold watch, those things that have been given for those types of awards for service, length of service, safety awards, you have not injured yourself for 10 years—that sort of thing.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I know the Senator from Utah has expressed his frustration with my committee and everybody else in town over this amendment. He says that these awards have not been taxable. They have been taxable. We have collected up to $50 million a year on these, that we can identify as awards and employee award income. We think there were additional taxes paid but we could not separately identify them. We also believe that once you clarify what is exempt, the revenue cost is going to go up.

I did not make them taxable to the employee. They have been taxable. We have been trying to accommodate the Senator from Utah, but it is difficult. What we have now are three different categories, deductible to the employer for up to $1,600 in each category, and with some limitations, employees could receive those awards year after year.

When the Senator from Utah introduced his bill, we modified it. It was modified working with Treasury, the Joint Tax Committee, the Senate Finance Committee staff, and the Senator's staff to add some antidiscrimination provisions and tighten it up so you could not have the awards every year, every 6 months, every 30 days, whatever. That has been the change.

I do not believe the original proposal was less expensive, Mr. President. I know there is some dispute over how you estimate the costs. I do not estimate the costs; my staff does not estimate the costs. The estimates come from the Treasury and the Joint Committee. They may be totally wrong on his issue. But if they are wrong on this, they are probably wrong on every other estimate in this $48 million package.

I believe we have a fair provision, Mr. President. I hope it is one that satisfies the Senator from Utah. It was supported by the committee. It is supported on this floor. We do not raise the same questions raised by the Senator from Ohio. But again, I do not know if there is some way the two of them might modify the provision so the estimated revenue loss would be less. Our estimated revenue loss over 3 years is $311 million. I think the figure of the Senator from Ohio is a 5-year figure. We are now collecting about $50 million a year in taxes. That is my explanation.

Mr. GARN. Mr. President, let me just respond, and I do not want to get into a big debate with the distinguished chairman of the committee, because as chairman of the Banking Committee, I do not want him to argue with me when I bring a bill on the floor from my committee.

My frustration, I say to the Senator from Ohio, is, I am sure what the Senator from Kansas speaks of as $50 million of revenue is not coming from what I have been trying to protect, service pins, watches, and so on. I defy anybody in this country who is wearing one of those pins or has a gold watch for retirement to tell me that he paid taxes on it. I just do not believe that as a practical thing.

Now, extending it, as the staff is afraid of, to other things, that has never been my intention. Once you do that, you open up a whole other can of worms. I do not want to open up a can of worms to revenue loss. I do not care about TV sets and such. I do not believe we cannot write an amendment that takes care of tradition—however we define traditional—awards of companies to employees those three categories.

I do not know what else to say. I have frankly gotten more involved in this over the last year and a half—and this is not a big amendment—out of frustration with what I thought was a little motherhood issue. I have gotten more stirred up, spent far more time on it than I think is justified because of that frustration on what I thought was a little problem, trying to protect these people who receive these awards and not get into this whole area of fringe benefits of all other sorts that people bring up. That is all I have been trying to accomplish, no more and no less.

The only suggestion I might have to the Senator from Ohio—I know he has other amendments—if he is willing to set this aside and give us until tomorrow or so until this bill is pending or at some later time to see if we can work out some acceptable language. If he is not, I suppose, there is no need to continue to talk about it. We can vote on it.

Mr. METZENBAUM. The Senator from Ohio, if it can be worked out and we reduce this revenue impact, has no objection. Whatever the Senator's preference. I am willing to go to a vote now or set it aside, whatever is the Senator's pleasure.

Mr. GARN. May I just ask the Senator from Ohio a question, after what I have tried so hard to explain about something that has not been taxed? Where is the Senator from Ohio getting his revenue estimate? Where can he show me that we are getting $780 million from gold watches and retirement pins and so on?

Mr. METZENBAUM. Page 775 of the report.

Mr. GARN. That is Treasury again.

Mr. METZENBAUM. I do not have any better source than Treasury. I cannot go to the Health and Human Services Department. I cannot go to the Labor Department to get these figures.

Mr. GARN. From a logical standpoint, does the Senator believe that these awards I am talking about have been taxed in the past?

Mr. METZENBAUM. I do believe this, that if you permit employers to give away gold watches, which will probably have diamonds in them as well, because a $4,800 watch is a very expensive and very deluxe watch, and my guess is that in many instances most of them were not even made in this country at that price——

Mr. GARN. If the Senator will yield, I want to clarify that point. Once again, that is adding everything together. If you happen to give to a single employee a $400 item four different times in each category, then you would be giving them 4, 8, 12 awards of $400 each. See how far they are stretching it to arrive at those estimates, the likelihood of somebody through their career having received 12 $400 awards? There is no $4,800 watch. That is not possible. There can be a $400 watch and you would have to give him that four times in each of three different categories to ever get the $4,800.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Is the Senator suggesting there is no such thing as a $4,800 watch?

Mr. GARN. I am suggesting it is not possible to give a $4,800 watch under this plan. That is the aggregate of three separate areas times $400 each—maximum award. It was my intention that it would be a $400 award at any one time, so if a man worked there 35 years, I guess what Treasury is saying, and you gave him four awards each in three different categories times three, that is $4,800. But it is not possible to give a $4,800 award to anybody.

Mr. METZENBAUM. I do not think I agree with the Senator from Utah on that, and I do not see anything in the report which indicates that you could not combine the three awards, that persons could receive the three awards. As a matter of fact, it says,

> The employer's deduction for the cost of one or more employee achievement awards awarded to a particular employee during the taxable year as qualified plan awards for the same qualifying achievement is limited to $1600, i.e., an aggregate maximum of $4800 if the employee receives awards deductible up to $1600 for each of the three achievement categories.

So that I think the report certainly contemplates you could receive the three achievement awards—I do not know what the three different categories are—and then receive the $4,800 watch.

Mr. GARN. Well, as I listened to the Senator from Ohio read that, it sounded to me like it was saying what I was saying, that you cannot give more than a $400 award. Apparently you could give 12 $400 awards, if that is the way it is written, over a period of time.

Mr. METZENBAUM. It does not say that. It does not say that. It says three $1,600 awards for each of the three achievement categories, an aggregate maximum of $4,800 if the employee receives awards deductible up to $1,600 for each of the three achievement categories.

Mr. GARN. I am not prepared to argue that other than to reiterate what I had been telling the Senator my intent was, and that was an aggregate in three different categories of four awards in each category to arrive at that figure.

Mr. DOLE. If the Senator will yield, I think, as I understand it, you might buy an employee three $1,600 watches but you could not buy him one $4,800 watch. Maybe you could give him the watch for safety and another $1,600 award for productivity. I assume there are ways to work that out. It may be you could trade three little watches in on a big one. The average amount of award, as I understand it, must be about $400, but the maximum award for one category for one employee is $1,600. You could not go to $1,600 for every employee. But under this provision, you can go up to $1,600 in each category.

Again, I think the record should indicate that it is not just a service pin. It may be a diamond service pin. I think the point is it should be taxable. That is the problem that bothers the distinguished Senator from Utah. Treasury said it should be. They said we adopted the amendment in 1981 which the Senator from Utah offered and we accepted at that time that there was not any change in prior policy, which meant it was still taxable as a longstanding tradition.

Mr. GARN. I might add one thing to that, if the Senator will yield. Maybe I should gain the floor to give him a little background on this.

In the original amendment 2 or 3 or 4 years ago, whenever it was, the situation was that an employer from an improved plan could only deduct $100. That had been in effect for more than 30 years. The price of gold was $35 an ounce when it was put into effect. And so that amendement raised it to $400, which did not come up nearly as high as the price of gold. It was not a factor as to where they used to give a pin with 14 karat gold or whatever, diamonds. Diamonds were vastly more expensive. If a company gave an award that cost $125, it was not just to deduct $100. They lost the $100 if it was $125. So even indexing for the increase in prices of the materials used in these pins and in watches, $400 recaptured a part of that 30-year erosion because of the increase in the value of what went into these things.

But that was satisfactory. At no time did I attempt to get it raised to the whole factor of what gold was at the time. I think it was over $800 an ounce compared to $35.

What happened is that Treasury is now saying, "Well, we excluded the first $100 and what we want to tax is over," but again, I repeat, it has never been taxed and they never came up with the regulations and they have never enforced it, so there is not a revenue loss. There may be a prospective loss from increase of taxes in the future, but these pins and service awards simply have not been taxed in the past. And so mine was to follow on and simply say this is terribly unfair to somebody getting that kind of an award, which again has no monetary value unless you melted it down, I suppose. Nobody wants somebody else's service pin or their inscribed watch.

Mr. President, I reformed the whole banking system in this country 2 years ago easier than what is a little amendment that I thought everybody on this floor would simply stand up and say: "Boy, are you right. We do not want that janitor or the maintenance man or the president of a company taxed when they have a little party for him when he leaves and they present him his gold watch for his service or his service pin." If I had any hair, I would tear it out, because it seems like such a simple little amendment to protect those being patted on the head and given a gold star or a pat on the back or somewhere else, and here we are, Treasury is saying $700 million becomes a revenue loss, but they have not proven it to me, for something that has not been taxed. They do not tax bald heads. I suppose they could say, "Well, because we are not taxing bald heads, that is a revenue loss and we want to tax them." But they have not taxed me before so there is no revenue loss for not taxing bald heads.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Vote.

Mr. DOLE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas is recognized.

Mr. DOLE. I do not want to get into a debate on this either. We have been debating it on this side for some time, but it is not just a one-time gift. I think the record ought to be clear on that. We support the amendment. We are prepared to vote on the amendment. It seems to me that the Senator from Utah has made his case. If we are going to finish this bill, we might as well vote.

So Mr. METZENBAUM's amendment (No. 2903) was rejected.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was rejected.

Mr. LONG. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio is recognized.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, this bill costs the Federal Treasury $2.5 million for fiscal year 1989 by gutting the tax liability of the life insurance industry. I think we ought to take a look at where the money is going. But I am frank to confess that I cannot understand the bill when I read it. Will the manager of the bill be good enough to explain some provisions of the bill so we can deal with some questions?

Mr. DOLE. I will be happy to do that.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I want to get into the insurance provisions of this bill, because the bill before us today provides a $2.5 billion tax cut through fiscal year 1989 to the life insurance industry. I am not sure what, if any, justification exists for the life insurance title of the bill, but I do know that it is utterly outrageous for the U.S. Congress to enact a $2.5 billion tax cut for a single industry. We have had our little experiment in tax-cut economics and we know all too well that it does not create a healthy economy. Massive tax cuts create massive Federal budgets. That is a fact. Before we go off and start cutting the tax burdens of corporations which are paying almost nothing now, we should have a thorough opportunity to discuss how we are accomplishing that feat to give them more to reduce their tax liability.

I intend to ask some questions as we start to flip our way through 168 pages of statutory language that provides this enormous tax cut, 168 pages out of the 1,334 to take care of the insurance industry. First, I would like to provide a little history behind the taxation of the life insurance industry in order to place the current legislation in perspective.

Since 1921, life insurance companies have received special tax treatment. Between 1921 and 1957, the industry was only taxed on its investment income. Then in 1959, Congress enacted the Life Insurance Investment Act of 1959. That act attempted to measure and tax the total economic income of a life insurance company rather than just its investment income. However, because of special rules and exceptions, which some would call loopholes, that legislation fell very far short of its goal of measuring total income.

While premium income is not the total income of a life insurance company, it is a relatively good measure of growth and profitability if not a total one. In 1960, life insurance premium income totaled $12 billion and the industry paid $518 million in taxes. In 1965, 5 years later, the premium income totaled $16 billion, up a third, and taxes collected amounted to $727 million, a rather proportionate increase.

In 1970, premium income was $21.7 billion and the industry paid $1.2 billion in taxes. In 1975, premium income came to $29.3 billion and taxes rose to $1.8 billion.

Each year through 1979, premium income grew, as did tax liability. In 1979, premium income stood at $39 billion and taxes at just below $3 billion. But beginning in 1980, the tax liability began to drop rapidly, while premium income continued to rise. In 1980, the industry paid $2.1 billion, a drop of $900 million, on $41 billion of premium income, an increase of $200 million.

In 1981, this tax bill fell to $1.2 billion on $47 billion of premium income, so that between 1979 and 1981, the tax bill dropped from $3 billion to $1.2 billion, or a 60-percent slash, while the premium income itself went up approximately 20 percent, from $39 billion to $47 billion.

Mr. President, what could explain the dramatic reduction in the tax bill of an industry that appeared to be prospering so well? The answer is the life insurance industry discovered a tax loophole. By entering into so-called modified coinsurance arrangements with one another, companies were able to reduce or, in some cases, to eliminate their tax liability. So Congress, in 1982 in the TEFRA bill, responded by repealing this loophole known as MODCO. But the industry was not just sitting by and waiving a grieving goodby. They hired the best in lobbyists, or so it now appears, because, while Congress was able to remove the loophole with one hand, the industry was able to force a temporary tax relief measure into Congress other hand. They argued that they could not bear up under this sudden and immediate increase in taxes of $1.1 billion that the loophole repeal would create. So they asked for some temporary relief, and we all know how tax lobbyists spell relief: it is t-a-x c-u-t. So, while striking the loophole from the law, Congress enacted a stopgap measure that reduced the insurance industry tax liability to a $2.2 billion bill in 1983.

The stopgap measure was intended to eliminate a sudden dramatic increase in the tax burden of the life insurance industry and it was intended to provide Congress an opportunity to revise the 1959 tax rules in order to insure that life insurance companies were paying taxes on their full economic income. It was never, and I repeat never, described on the Senate floor or anywhere else, as far as I can determine, that that stopgap was intended as a period for the insurance industry to further lobby for additional tax cuts. That was not the deal that Congress offered the insurance lobby in exchange for eliminating their loopholes. In fact, Mr. President, I do not believe Congress should ever have to pay any price for eliminating tax loopholes.

Certainly, I believe that if the Senate knew that stopgap would be used by the insurance lobby to attempt to achieve that objective, the stopgap would never have been enacted.

The stopgap measure expired at the end of 1983; so, for 1984, the insurance industry should pay an estimated $3 billion in taxes. Of course, that is about the same level of taxes paid in 1979, when the dollar was worth quite a bit more. But they were not satisfied with that result. So they screamed. And back to Washington they marched.

Mr. President, they never should have enjoyed the loophole they did in the first place. But the fact is that the industry did not pay its fair share and now wants to make sure that it does not do so in the future. Their lobbyists have presented their case to my office, and a remarkable one it is. They tell us that their competitors, other financial institutions, are paying so little in taxes and, of course, they are right. According to a Joint Tax Committee study, financial institutions paid a negative 3.98-percent effective tax rate in 1982 on U.S. income. That is to say they received so many tax refunds that they either received tax refunds from tax bills or excess writeoffs to reduce future tax liabilities of $54 million. The U.S. Treasury paid the companies.

That is a great way to run a country, Mr. President, have the Treasury refunding money rather than collecting money for the tax bills of those same corporations. And the insurance industry says that it deserves equal treatment.

I may say, Mr. President, that I think all financial institutions ought to be treated the same, but I think all Americans ought to be treated the same. I think there ought to be tax equity and I think there ought to be fairness. What is there in our laws that makes it possible for insurance companies and financial institutions to be able to come here to Congress and, year after year, get special tax benefits that nobody else in America can get unless they have the high-priced lobbyists that these companies do?

If banks are not paying their fair share, then we have an obligation to correct the tax rules that apply to them. This is one Senator who would very much like to see that legislative proposal come before this body. In fact, I hope we do not have to wait until next tax year's bill to act.

The distinguished manager of the bill has said, "Show me some more tax loopholes." There are so many tax loopholes, so many corporations not paying their fair share of taxes, so many industries just not doing what is right as far as the tax revenues of this country are concerned that you could have a line of them placed all around the Capitol Building.

I believe that instead of extending the tax loopholes further, we ought to be doing something to tax the other financial institutions, not providing these special advantages to the insurance companies. But to argue that because the banks are not paying any taxes the insurance industry deserves a tax cut is absurd. It is preposterous. Perhaps we should remind ourselves of the prncipal objective of the corporate income tax. It is to raise revenue to finance government. It is not an AFDC provision, aid for dependent corporations.

Mr. President, this bill costs the Federal Treasury $2.5 billion through fiscal year 1989 by gutting the tax liability of the life insurance industry.

I believe we should take a look at where that money is going. But there is not one Member of this body who can read the tax bill and know what is in it when it comes to the sections having to do with the life insurance industry, 166 pages of them, all so compicated, all so well drafted by those who are experts in this area that even the staffs that work around the Senate are not very certain as to what they provide.

Mr. President, I would appreciate the manager of the bill explaining the effect of section 809(g)(5), which is to be found on page 589 on line 19. It provides as follows:

Reduction in equity base for portion of equity allowable to life insurance business in noncontiguous Western Hemisphere countries.

I would like to ask what does it mean, what companies will benefit by this particular language, and how much will it cost the Federal Treasury?

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, let me say, before I attempt to answer the precise question, that many of the things the Senator from Ohio just indicated, I do not know whether I disagree with or not. It is sometimes not just a question of knowing about a loophole; it is having the votes to close it. The Senator from Ohio indicated the insurance industry did an excellent job. They think, as the Senator indicated, they are paying about the same rate of tax as other financial institutions. The records would reflect, at least from Treasury and Joint Committee, that they will be paying about $1 billion a year more in taxes than they were under TEFRA. But I think it is fair to say, as the Senator from Ohio suggested, that their tax rate is not particularly burdensome, not particularly high. Based on an agreement worked out on the House side and agreements worked out on the Senate side, the 166 pages the Senator referred to is pretty much what our committee decided was an appropriate way to proceed. Having done that, we now expect to prevail, if we can, on the Senate floor.

With reference to the specific question of the Senator, we hope the life insurance provisions rationalize the taxation of companies in this industry. Under present law, most mutual companies would have too high a tax liability relative to their company's equity. We believe the legislation will provide a better balance between the tax liability of mutual and stock life insurance companies. However, some mutual companies, such as the one the Senator mentioned in whatever section it was—is it Pan American?

Mr. METZENBAUM. 809(g)(5).

Mr. DOLE. 809(g)(5)——

Mr. METZENBAUM. That is the one having to do with noncontiguous Western Hemisphere countries.

Mr. DOLE. Right. It is one of several provisions which will mitigate the tax burden for these companies. Some mutual companies will have a substantial tax increase under these provisons because they have special kinds of insurance business which requires a higher than average level of surplus. I think that is true of this particular instance and also of I think a couple other items that the Senator from Ohio may raise. We have three provisons, the one the Senator referred to on page 589, another example on page 590, and another example on page 592. But again I say to the distinguished Senator from Ohio, it is one thing to point out what appears to be a loophole, and in some cases the Senator from Ohio may be exactly correct, it is another thing to be able to close it.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Will the Senator be good enough to explain what that language means? What particular company is involved and how much is the tax loss from that provision alone?

Mr. DOLE. Let me yield to the distinguished Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, Senators would assume that I would be familiar with this provision. It turns out that this involves the Pan American Life Insurance Co., and their headquarters is in New Orleans, La., so one would assume that I would be familiar with this matter. Actually, I did not become acquainted with it until the Senator brought it up. This matter is in the corresponding House bill. It was initiated by the Select Revenue Measures Subcommittee chaired by Congressman PETE STARK in the House of Representatives, when that subcommittee was working on these insurance provisions.

This provision has to do with the difference between situations that exist in Central and South America, compared to the situation in the United States. The Central and South American provision recognizes that there is a special situation, requiring much larger amounts of capital reserve, to insure in that area. Under the life insurance provisions, the tax on a mutual life insurance company is partly computed as a percentage return on its equity. This works perfectly well where the insurance company conducts normal life insurance operations. However, where the company sells a large amount of its policies in Central and South America, its risks are unusual. For example, in that area there is not only a difference in life expectancy, there are also risks that have to do with terrorism, extortion, kidnapping, and other uncertainties that just are not the case in the United States, at least not to the same degree.

Such a company will have to maintain an unusually large equity base, compared to what it would do in the United States, to account for the fact that the life expectancies in those countries are different from expectancies in the United States. This provision is intended to make the equity base for such companies comparable to the equity base of life insurance companies generally.

Without this provision, mutual life insurance companies doing business in Latin America will bear a disproportionate amount of tax, merely because they must keep a larger equity cushion against a very substantial risk.

(Mr. EVANS assumed the chair.)

Mr. METZENBAUM. I had no idea where this amendment came from, but I do know in reading the bill we were unable to determine why it was included. It was obvious that it was framed for one particular company and when you read it——

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, it would be more correct to say it was framed at the urging of one particular company. I am confident that Pan American is not the only insurance company that does business in Latin America. I should think that other American companies do quite a bit of insuring in Latin America, but I do know Pan America does insure some people in Latin America. It also has a lot of insurance business in the United States.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Would the Senator be good enough to advise what would be the tax impact if this clause were not in the bill?

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I do not have an estimate on that. I am sorry. If I had it, I would make it available to the Senator. If I can get it, I will provide it.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Well, as I read this language——

Mr. DOLE. I am advised it is probably less than $1 million a year.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Pan American Life Insurance Co. is a very large, substantial, thriving insurance company, is it not?

Mr. LONG. It is a successful company. I know that it is successful enough to own an office building, because it has one in New Orleans, a lovely building.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Will the Senator be good enough to explain to me how a provision such as this winds up in the bill?

The equity base of any mutual life insurance company shall be reduced by an amount equal to the portion of the equity base attributable to the life insurance business multiplied by a fraction—

(A) the numerator of which is the portion of the tax reserves which is allocable to life insurance contracts issued on the life of residents of countries in the Western Hemisphere which are not contiguous to the United States, and

(B) the denominator of which is the amount of the tax reserves allocable to life insurance contracts.

The preceding sentence shall not apply unless the fraction determined under the preceding sentence exceeds 1/20.

What does that mean?

Mr. LONG. I did not write the language, but I think I can tell the Senator how that kind of language comes to be written. I assume it comes to be written the same way it would be written if I had offered the amendment. I would say, "Here is the problem, and I would like to ask that the staff prepare the amendment." So the staff writes the amendment, and they do the best they can. I must share the Senator's confusion about the matter.

Some years ago, a good friend of mine, who is a justice on the court of appeals, and who had been a great tax lawyer, said when he was practicing law:

We should see if we can hire somebody to rewrite the Internal Revenue Code in language the ordinary person can understand—for that matter, language we lawyers can understand.

But it did not happen. I assume the draftsmen do the best they can, as the good Lord gives them the light to see it. If I had written the provision, that is not how it would have been written. But who am I? I did not write the Internal Revenue Code, even though from time to time I have suggested that I would like to see a provision to take care of this or that matter, and had someone draft the provision.

Mr. METZENBAUM. When I asked the staff about this, I did not get too much of an answer, either.

I find that all the provisions with respect to the insurance industry seem to have come down from somewhere on high, and I guess that is from the insurance lobby.

Mr. LONG. That language has been passed on by the Treasury, I am sure. The Treasury supports this life insurance language.

Mr. METZENBAUM. I should like to see some confirmation that the Treasury supports it. Is there some confirmation of the fact that the Treasury supports it? We have been trying to find out where the Treasury stands on a number of matters, and they have done a disappearing act.

Mr. DOLE. They are out in the lobby.

Mr. METZENBAUM. We went out, as a matter of fact.

Mr. DOLE. They saw you coming. [Laughter.]

Mr. METZENBAUM. Ten minutes ago, we went out, and we could not find out what their position was.

Mr. LONG. My information is that the Treasury supports the bill and supports the life insurance provision in it.

Mr. METZENBAUM. They were in my office the other day, saying they do not support the whole bill.

Mr. LONG. The Senator can find out from them, if he wants to, and they can speak for themselves. I would much prefer that they do that.

Mr. METZENBAUM. I ask the manager of the bill if he would be kind enough to tell me about this:

REDUCTION IN EQUITY BASE FOR MUTUAL SUCCESSOR OF FRATERNAL BENEFIT SOCIETY.—In the case of any mutual life insurance company which—

(A) is the successor to a fraternal benefit society, and

(A) is the successor to a

(B) which assumed the surplus of such fraternal benefit society in 1950, the equity base of such mutual life insurance company shall be reduced by the amount of the surplus so assumed plus earnings thereon, (i) for taxable years before 1984, at a 7 percent interest rate, and (ii) for taxable years 1984 and following, at the average mutual earnings rate for such year.

Obviously, that was not drafted for any particular company; that just happened to fall into the code. A lot of companies fall into the category of being mutual benefit societies that assumed benefits for a mutal benefit society in 1950, and the 7-percent interest rate is obviously far less than they were earning during that period.

To whom does this apply, which company, and how much is involved? What is the net reduction in tax revenues by reason of it?

Mr. DOLE. This involves a Kansas company and would result in a reduction of about $5 million per year.

Mr. METZENBAUM. $5 million a year?

Mr. DOLE. It is estimated that way, but we understand that it more likely will be less than $2 million. It is pretty much like the last amendment discussed, and I understand that the Senator has a number of these.

Obviously, they are drafted not as the Senator suggests, to apply to one situation, but narrowly to limit the revenue loss.

As I indicated earlier, there was an effort to sort of rationalize the taxation of companies in this industry, and under the present law, most mutual companies have a higher tax liability, including this one.

Under the present law, there is a complicated three-phase system that taxes investment income and underwriting income. Under the committee bill, the amount of income tax a mutual company will pay will depend in part on the mutual company's equity.

This is because the bill contemplates that an additional add-on element of the mutual company's tax base will be calculated by multiplying the mutual company's equity by the difference between the rate of return on equity for stock companies and mutual companies. The bill reduces the equity base of a mutual company by the present value of the equity assumed from a predecessor fraternal benefit society, which is the case just cited.

The rule recognizes in the bill that certain mutual life insurance companies have accumulated high amounts of surplus during a period their tax was not related to the surplus.

I think it is in the same category. It was carefully drafted so that it would limit any revenue loss.

I again indicate that it does apply to a Kansas company, a constituent company, and we hope it meets the approval of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. METZENBAUM. The net that I get from my good friend from Louisiana and my good friend from Kansas is that this tax bill is a special tax bill. One company in Louisiana gets special tax privileges and pays less taxes because it is a provision that is written just to take care of them. One company in Kansas saves $5 million a year, as I understand the response, because the language is drafted especially for them.

I thought tax laws were supposed to be equally applicable to everybody, that we did not draft laws to specifically take care of company X or company Y or company Q, and that we did not draft laws for particular individuals. But we have here—and I have not finished with the insurance provision—two insurance companies which are getting special privileges, special arrangements.

I can understand those things happening when Chrysler was in trouble and came to Congress and they were trying to save their business. We did something special for them. I can understand when we do something special for the steel industry when it is in trouble. We do it for the industry. I can understand when we do something for other industries that are in trouble. But here we have a thriving industry; and what we are doing, first of all, is charging them a very low rate of tax. Then we are saying, "Yes, it is a low rate of tax, but we will take care of you specially, besides. You have us on your side."

I just have to say that there is to me such a thing as fairness, and it is not fair to treat some people who have good advocates and good people speaking up for them in a different way than we treat other companies.

As a matter of fact, go to page 592, and let us look at the next one and see which company that is.

We know there was a Louisiana company, there is a Kansas company, and then we go to section 809(i), and 809(i) is "Transitional Rule for Certain High-Surplus Mutual Life Insurance Companies."

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a moment?

Mr. METZENBAUM. I yield.

Mr. LONG. I am not familiar with the situation involving the Kansas company. I do have knowledge of the situation involving the Pan American Life Insurance Co. Let me say to the Senator, regarding that provision, that it applies to any mutual life insurance company doing business in Latin America. I do not know what mutual companies other than Pan American are doing business down there. But if there are any, the provision applies to them and also to any company which in the future does business there.

The problem was raised by a particular company, a mutual insurance company doing business in Latin America.

We had group after group come before the committee. The stock companies had one thing in mind. The mutual companies had another thing in mind.

After we got through putting together a bill, then the smaller companies came in. They felt that they had not been adequately considered. The bill was amended to their advantage because they had a point that they were entitled to get better consideration, not necessarily compared to a manufacturing company, but compared to the other insurance companies. On that basis, they felt that they were not being treated fairly, and the committee modified the bill to agree with them.

Everyone is entitled to be treated fairly, whether it is a single company that is being treated fairly or a number of companies are being treated fairly. No one should be treated unfairly, whether he is alone in his position or whether he has numbers on his side.

To say just because this provision may only involve one company, that it should be treated less fairly than others overlooks the fact that we are trying to treat everyone justly and fairly, taking all factors into account.

The provision of which the Senator made reference has to do with a very simple matter. If you have higher expenses and higher costs, it is fair to ask the Congress to draft legislation to take your situation into consideration.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I wish to point out to my good friend that if you have higher expenses and higher costs you pay less because you make less. That happens to everyone in the business world. It has nothing to do with higher expenses or higher costs. This has to do with the equity base.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, the reason that insurance companies do not pay as much tax on a given amount of income as other industries do is that they have a requirement to build up reserves.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Of course.

Mr. LONG. And because it requires a larger reserve to handle a risk that is greater, it would naturally require that one be able to have a more substantial deduction if this is necessary to build up the required reserves.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Will the Senator from Louisiana be good enough to advise me what are the earnings of Pan American Life Insurance Co. for recent years?

Mr. LONG. I do not know. I did not know Pan American was involved in any particular provision in the bill until the Senator brought the matter up.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Is it not a fact that Pan American is building tremendously new big buildings and is looking like a very successful company? What taxes do they pay now?

Mr. LONG. I do not even know if they have a mortgage on the building in New Orleans, or how much. I only know that they have a building there.

What difference should it make? It seems to me we should legislate based on principles and not on prejudice.

Mr. METZENBAUM. That is exactly the point. We should legislate based upon principle and not legislate for any special companies, and that is what we are doing in this bill.

First we take care of Louisiana. Then we take care of Kansas. And we are going to take care of some others in this bill as well, and we will talk about them. There should be equity and principle, and that is exactly what we should be talking about.

Mr. LONG. I say to the Senator that we are legislating for everyone in the insurance business in this bill, and we are trying to be just and fair to all of them. In doing that, if being fair means that you look at the situation of an individual company, then I think you should do it. If you find that one particular person is getting the worst of it, and is not being treated fairly, then it is appropriate to draw a provision limited to that particular situation to take care of him.

I find nothing wrong with saying that if you are doing business in Latin America, there are good reasons why you should be treated somewhat differently than if you are doing business outside of Latin America. If the situation justifies drawing a provision like that, then I think you should draw it, because I think you should try to be fair to all taxpayers, even if it is only one person who is caught in a very unfair situation.

Mr. METZENBAUM. If there were some inequity, if there were some problem that a company was having, I would buy that.

But you go through these 166 pages and you are not looking at companies that are having economic difficulties; at least no one has made that argument. The report does not say that.

What we are talking about is specially carved out provisions so that certain companies will pay less taxes than other companies.

I understand, whether they are doing business in the Western Hemisphere that is not contiguous to the United States or not, that is not a determinant. They still make a profit. Their rates are higher if they they have to be higher because of terrorism and whatever else down there. But the facts are that this is a specially carved out provision.

I do not hold the distinguished Senator from Louisiana responsible for this particular amendment. I think he has already indicated it came over from the House of Representatives. When I raised it I did not know where it came from because I am going to ask about five or six others, and I do not know what the authorship is. I do not know where they come from.

I do not understand these provisions, and I believe that when we are carving out special language for special corporations we have a right on this floor to know why it is being carved out.

And it so happens that the two that came up were the Kansas one and the Louisiana one, and those happen to be in order. We went to 809(g)(5) and went to 809(g)(7), and going now right on through the rest of the provisions of this bill to find out which companies are being taken care of.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, I wish to make this point:

The largest number of bills that are passed through this Senate in any session of Congress are special relief bills reported out of the Judiciary Committee on which the Senator serves, a fine committee. I vote for them, and I am not complaining about any of them. But those bills usually are limited to a single individual. They are passed after looking at the problem that a single individual has, and the merits of his case, and the Congress legislates for the benefit of a single person, a single individual.

Mr. METZENBAUM. As the Senator knows, in order to get one of those through, you have to recite all the facts. You have to get a sign-off from this agency and that agency, and many of them are stopped at the Judiciary Committee. They do not go through pro forma. And the facts are that we scrutinize them very thoroughly, and this Senator can tell the Senator that I read every one of them and in some instances we have stopped a number of them. Senator SIMPSON has been a party to stopping some of them.

And most of the time when we have a special bill, it is because someone ran out of the statute of limitations and there was some justifiable reason why he should have his or her day in court.

But here we are talking about something totally different.

Mr. LONG. When the Senator is talking about cold scrutiny, the same thing applies to what the Finance Committee does. These measures have also been closely looked at.

Mr. METZENBAUM. I can say that I hear what the Senator says but I have not heard any good argument as to why one company should pick up $1 million. I do not know what they are paying. I do not know whether that is $1 million against $2 million or $1 million against $20 million. No one seems to know that answer. I do not know what their earnings are.

I think the Senate is entitled to know, and I do not know what the $5 million is against, whether it is $5 million in savings as against $7 million or $5 million against $50 million. I think that we are entitled to know.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Ohio yield?

Mr. METZENBAUM. I yield.

Mr. DOLE. We can discuss all these. I just want the record to indicate Security Beneficial will still be paying more income tax through this bill than either under TEFRA or the 1959 act, and also point out the next one we will be discussing involves the Southern Life Insurance Co. located in Cincinnati, Ohio.

Mr. METZENBAUM. I could not care less whether it is located in Ohio or in Cleveland or anywhere else. That does not make it right if it is wrong. So I will address myself to the next one in the same way because I am not going to come out here and say because it is an Ohio company we should take care of them and they should be treated differently than someone in one of the other 49 States.

It is my understanding, Mr. President, that the Senator from Massachusetts wishes the floor for a totally different purpose, and if there is no objection on the part of the managers of the bill, I ask unanimous consent at this point that the Senator from Massachusetts be accorded the floor with the understanding that his remarks be included at the conclusion of our debate or amendment having to do with the subject of insurance.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

AMENDMENT NO. 2905

(Purpose: To express the sense of the Congress against the mining of Nicaraguan ports and the withdrawal of World Court jurisdiction over Central America)

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Massachusetts (Mr. KENNEDY) proposes an amendment numbered 2905.

At the appropriate place in the Dole amendment, add the following new section:

"SEC. —. It is the sense of the Congress that—

(a) no funds heretofore or hereafter appropriated in any Act of Congress shall be obligated or expended for the purpose of planning, directing, executing, or supporting the mining of the ports or territorial waters of Nicaragua; and

(b) the United States shall immediately withdraw the modification submitted on April 6, 1984 to the jurisdiction of the International Court of Justice over the United States with respect to disputes with any Central American state or arising out of or related to events in Central America.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I know that there is an extremely important revenue measure before the Senate. Actually, it is styled as an amendment to the Federal Boat Safety Act of 1971. But I know that the matter that is before us now is of great importance in terms of our economy, equity, and revenue raising, and that the Senate must address itself to that particular issue. I know that the bill itself is over 1,000 pages, 1,300 pages or so.

But I raise this issue this evening, Mr. President, because I do feel that there is another matter of urgency and of great importance. I want to indicate at the outset of the discussion on this amendment that I am quite prepared to move to a vote on this measure with a time limitation. I would, of course, prefer to have this amendment printed in the RECORD and the remarks that I will make in support of it also to appear, and then to vote on it at a time certain tomorrow.

I believe that the issue is not complex. It is one of enormous importance in terms of policy. I would be more than glad to work out a time limit with the floor manager of the bill and suggest that we might be able to work out an hour's time limitation, evenly divided, after I make a brief statement explaining the purposes of the amendment.

As I say, I would prefer to vote tomorrow on it just because I have not had the opportunity to notify all the Members. I know that the chairman of the committee wants to move forward, and I will try and work out with the floor manager an appropriate time to vote.

Mr. DOLE. Could we reach some agreement now on time?

Mr. KENNEDY. If the Senator wanted to make a 2-hour time limitation, evenly divided, then I would ask that I start using my time at the present time. Otherwise, perhaps an hour, evenly divided, and the time to be started after my statement.

I obviously would prefer the vote tomorrow within a short time limit after we come in tomorrow.

Mr. DOLE. I would want to confer with the majority leader on that. This, of course, is the very reason that some of us suggested that we ought to file cloture immediately, as I previously recited on the last debt limit bill we faced a number of non-germane amendments—on Jordanian arms sales, on Lebanon and other things that had nothing to do with the debt ceiling. This amendment today obviously has nothing to do with deficit reduction, although it may be a very important issue. But, obviously, the bill is open for amendment.

The Senator indicated earlier that he could agree to maybe 20 minutes to a side when he talked to me privately. If we could agree on 20 minutes on a side or 30 minutes for you and 10 for us, then we could vote by 6:30, depending on whether the majority leader wants to vote tonight or tomorrow.

Mr. KENNEDY. I had hoped, as the Senator from Kansas knows, that we would have had a greater opportunity for debate and discussion on Central America during the course of last week. We entered into a series of time limitations at that time. I was in accord with those time limitations which were worked out with the majority leader. And I in no way suggest that there was anything but good faith in working those time limitations out. But it did seem to me that if that debate had continued over the course of this weekend, perhaps one more day, then I think that this would certainly be an issue on which the Senate would want to have a full dialog, full debate, and full discussion. It is a matter of enormous importance and consequence. It is certainly something that I think as Members of this body we should address.

I am quite prepared to try to get a time limitation that would respond to the needs of the Senator from Kansas to move this whole bill forward and not unduly delay consideration of the legislation.

But I would also like to see if we cannot get a time limitation for the vote to occur tomorrow so that all the Members will have sufficient notice. I think this is important. It is now close to 6 o'clock. I noticed in the last vote that only 82 Members were present. I think this is important. In fairness to our colleagues on this issue, I hope that we would be able to maybe debate this issue tonight, which I am glad to do, and then have a more limited period of time tomorrow when we come in for a final vote. I am, as I say, more than glad to debate it this evening if we can work out some time limitation in that way.

Mr. DOLE. I wonder if I might suggest that the Senator just offer the amendment tomorrow. Why tie up the Finance Committee all night long on this amendment if you do not want to vote on it tonight? The Senator already has his press release. The amendment has been offered. It will be in all the papers tomorrow. If the Senator would withdraw it, we can vote on it tomorrow afternoon.

Mr. KENNEDY. I would say that if Members wanted to offer amendments, I would ask that my amendment be set aside, Mr. President, to accommodate the reasonable request of the Senator from Kansas. I think that is a reasonable request. I would like to make a statement on the issue, but I would, if there were Members who had amendments and wanted to consider those amendments, I would ask that it be temporarily set aside so that the Senate could move ahead and consider those amendments. I can give assurances to the floor manager that I would remain with him until we have an opportunity to work out the timeframe in a satisfactory way. But I will be glad, if the chairman of the Finance Committee indicates to me that he does have other amendments that need the attention of the Senate, to ask that the amendment be set aside so that the Senate can proceed. I hope that we could work out a time so that there will be as much notice as possible to consider this amendment at a time certain.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is the Senator from Massachusetts asking unanimous consent that his amendment be withdrawn?

Mr. KENNEDY. No, Mr. President, I do not do so at this time, although I want to indicate that I would be prepared to do so at any time in order to accommodate the schedule of the Senate.

Mr. President, it would be my intention to speak on this measure at the present time. I am glad to yield to the majority leader for a question.

Mr. BAKER. I thank the Senator.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senator may yield to me without losing his right to the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I would not favor setting this amendment aside. I think we ought to go ahead with it. That is up to the managers, of course. I will support whatever decision they make. But I think coming as it does on this bill that we ought to plow on through it. I had hoped that we would not have nongermane amendments offered. I had hoped after our colloquy this morning that we could get on with the business at hand.

There was a fair amount of controversy this morning on whether or not the two managers of the bill would ask the leadership to file cloture. There was an indication, as I understood it, that nongermane amendments had not been planned.

I do not criticize the Senator from Massachusetts, nor certainly the minority leader. But it comes as a surprise to me that after colloquy this morning we are faced now with an amendment that is so clearly out of the category of those in contemplation of the managers. I am somewhat surprised. But since we have it, and the Senator is clearly within his rights, I would recommend to the two managers that we proceed to dispose of it tonight.

I thank the Senator for yielding.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts is recongized.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, this is a dark moment in the history of our Nation.

We now know that U.S. personnel played a direct role in mining the territorial waters of Nicaragua. In my opinion, this action—taken without any warning to the maritime nations of the world—is a clear violation of every basic principle of international law. In my opinion, this action is an insult to our fundamental values as a nation and to our traditions as a law-abiding people.

What has been accomplished by this action?

Two of our closest allies—Great Britain and France—have made their opposition clear.

Millions of dollars of damage has been done to five foreign-registered freighters and tankers—including Dutch, Panamanian, Liberian, Soviet, and Japanese ships.

Numerous innocent crewmen of these ships have been seriously injured as a result of the explosions.

At least two Nicaraguan fishing boats have been blown up, two Nicaraguan fishermen have been killed, and many, many others have been injured.

I challenge any member of this body to point to any provision of international law that, under any interpretation, permits this kind of unannounced death and destruction to be visited upon innocent civilians.

And, as reports of U.S. involvement in and responsibility for the mining came out, what was the response from the Reagan administration?

As reports of our involvement came out, as the American people finally learned what we are really doing in Nicaragua, as the whole world watched to see how the United States of America would react to this news, the Secretary of State announced last Friday that the United States would no longer submit itself to the jurisdiction of the World Court with respect to disputes with any nations in Central America.

What a disgrace.

Mr. President, that announcement will live in history as a blot on the honor of the United States of America. It will haunt this Nation for many years to come.

By removing ourselves from the jurisdiction of the World Court, we may be able to avoid a finding in that Court that the United States is guilty of violating international law. But today in the court of world public opinion, the Reagan administration has branded the United States of America as a lawbreaker.

This is also a dark moment in the history of the U.S. Senate.

We now know that, last Wednesday, at the very same moment that we were debating the legality of our activities in Nicaragua on the floor of this Chamber, the Reagan administration was in the act of deciding to withdraw the United States from the jurisdiction of the World Court.

We now know that, last Wednesday, at the very same moment that we were debating whether the United States should send military assistance to the Contras for terror or sabotage, individuals employed and associated with the CIA were mining the harbors and territorial waters of Nicaragua.

At the moment this body refused to prohibit the use of U.S. funds for terror or sabotage in Nicaragua, U.S. personnel were themselves engaged in acts of terror and sabotage.

We know now that in too many ways, in the use of terror and sabotage, in disregard for civilians and elementary standards of international law, the Reagan administration is Sovietizing American foreign policy. I believe we cannot defeat our adversaries by becoming like them.

Today I am introducing an amendment that will accomplish two things: First, it expresses the sense of the Senate that the United States should not withdraw from the jurisdiction of the World Court with respect to disputes involving the nations of Central America; and second, it prohibits the use of any U.S. assistance for the purpose of mining the territorial waters of Nicaragua.

As to this first provision, who here will argue that we should turn our backs on the world court.

Last week, during our debate on whether we should send an additional $21 million in military assistance to the Contras in Nicaragua, I, alone with other Senators argued that the Contras were engaged in an effort to overthow the Government of Nicaragua, that the Contras were about the business of destroying the economic infrastructure of Nicaragua, and that we were violating international law if we assisted them in those enterprises.

We were repeatedly assured by the supporters of the "secret war," "oh, no. Be of good cheer. We are doing nothing of the kind. We are not lawbreakers. We are merely assisting El Salvador and Honduras in their collective self-defense. We are merely interdicting shipments of war material from Nicaragua to the guerrillas in El Salvador. We are merely putting pressure on the Sandinistas to obey international law."

If those Senators are so confident that the United States is not violating international law, if those Senators are so certain that we will prevail in the world court, let them come forward and say to the President, "We are not afraid. Let the trial go forward. Our cause is just."

Our sudden withdrawal last Friday was, in itself, a violation of our international legal obligations.

There is a provision in the U.S. notice of acceptance filed with the United Nations in 1946 that requires the United States to give 6 months' notice before withdrawing jurisdiction over the United States from the World Court.

According to the report of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee which accompanied our acceptance of World Court jurisdiction in 1946:

The purpose of the 6-month notice provision was to make clear that the United States was renouncing any intention to withdraw our obligation in the face of a threatened legal proceeding.

Those are the words, Mr. President, that were used at that particular time—we have no "intention to withdraw our obligation in the face of a threatened legal proceeding." We have violated that 6-month notice provision.

And what about the policy of mining the territorial waters of Nicaragua?

Last week, most of the members of the Intelligence Committee voted to continue the funding of the Contras in Nicaragua. But some of these same Senators indicated that they now had reservations. Let us take Senator COHEN as an example. Last week he said:

I am concerned that the administration has not been paying enough attention to the very strict restrictions we have placed upon the type of activity that could be performed in order to encourage the Sandinistas to come to the bargaining table, in order to interdict the flow of supplies, and in order to promote the Contadora process. What I am concerned about is that we are ignoring the Contadora process while the Contras turn loose the attacks on the economic infrastructure. If that escalates, it is going to be in direct violation of the restrictions established by the Intelligence Committee.

Let us look at a map, and let us examine Senator COHEN's justifications for supporting the Contras.

We now know that under U.S. supervision mines have been laid in the harbor and off the port of El Bluff. That town is in the southeastern corner of Nicaragua on the Caribbean coast.

Does anyone here believe that the Sandinistas are using the harbor of El Bluff to ship war materiel to the guerrillas of El Salvador?

Does anyone here believe that mining that tiny harbor on the other side of the isthmus from El Salvador has anything whatsoever to do with interdicting shipments of arms to El Salvador?

Does anyone here believe that, by mining a tiny Caribbean port hundreds of miles away from the borders of El Salvador and Honduras, we are assisting in the collective defense of those two nations?

Does anyone here believe that by blowing up fishing boats and killing fishermen, we are encouraging the Sandinistas to come to the bargaining table?

Does anyone here believe that, by intimidating the citizens of El Bluff, we are promotiong the Contadora process?

No, Mr. President. This policy defies all logic. It defies all reason. And it defies all law.

Mining the harbor of El Bluff is part and parcel of a full-scale, indiscriminate attack on Nicaragua for the purpose of destroying the Nicaraguan economy and overthrowing the Nicaraguan Government.

There can be no other explanation for this conduct.

Mr. President, let us tell the President of the United States that this Nation does not turn its back on the law, that the United States of America will live up to its obligations as a member of the civilized world.

Of all the nations in the world, we should be the proponents of international law, the upholders of international law, the defenders of international law. Today let us send a message to the people of the world as well as to the President of the United States. Let us state loudly and clearly: "We believe in the rule of law, and we want the United States to obey the rule of law."

Mr. President, during the debate last week, I outlined for the Senate a series of similar kinds of activities that were being initiated by the Contras. The involvement of the Central Intelligence Agency in those kinds of activities was not entirely clear. What we do know now is that the Agency itself has been very much involved in the oversight, supervision, and the laying of the mines in those particular harbors of Nicaragua.

But there were a series of other activities which I reviewed very briefly for the Senate last week during the debate on whether we should continue sending military assistance to the Contras. Those activities were on land. What we see now is the policy at work at sea. This has been a basic assault—not so much on the lines of supply from Nicaragua to El Salvador and the flow of arms to El Salvador—but attacks on civilian or civilian-related targets.

I mentioned that on December 19, 1983, the Contras attacked a farm cooperative in El Coco and after a furious battle that lasted over 2 hours the town was taken and 14 people were killed, including 2 young women.

So we have the mining of the harbors and the attack last December on a farm cooperative in El Coco.

Only a few weeks ago, on February 25, I reviewed in detail the sinking of various ships in El Bluff. Then on March 2, 3, and 4 I mentioned the border towns that were shelled by mortar fire. These are towns or villages inhabited by civilians which were shelled. The best information is that they were shelled from somewhere within Honduras. It is not unreasonable to assume, that this shelling was being initiated by the Contras.

On March 7, a ship struck a mine in Corinto and suffered severe damage. A number of members of the crew were injured. That was a Panamanian ship.

And then on March 16, the Contras killed three peasants and a school director in the town of Esteli. On that same day, seven members of a farm cooperative were killed in the town of San Ramon.

On the following day, 11 peasants were shot down and 7 were kidnaped in Pueblo Nuevo.

Mr. President, this series of incidents involved an attack on a farm cooperative; assaults on small villages near border areas, principally inhabited by the civilians; assaults on farm cooperatives; and attacks on peasants.

I think it is important that the American people have their attention drawn to the activity of the CIA in its mining of these various harbors. They should recognize that their money is not only being used for the purchase of mines for that operation, but their tax money as well is being spent in these other areas of significant disruption and assault on civilian targets.

It is important for us to recognize that this is the case.

When we were debating this issue just a few days ago, we did not have the situation so clearly defined as we have it on this Monday evening. It seems to me, Mr. President, that most Americans must be shocked with this revelation.

These other assaults and attacks on civilian targets really fell by the wayside when we were in the course of this debate, when we were addressing this issue. But I dare say if we have a chance to address this issue again—and I indicated in the course of the debate that we would have a chance to address the issues which we debated last week—we would have an opportunity at an early date, but I did not believe it would come so soon, really only a matter of hours from the time of final voting on that supplemental bill.

Mr. President, we will have the chance to vote on this issue again, and I might say we will have a chance to vote on the issue probably again and again and again because it is an issue that will not go away.

The particular legislation, as I mentioned before, may go away, may be passed, amendments may be tabled, but the issue is not going away, and the Members of this body are going to have to understand that we are going to have to address it and we will address it again and again and again because the American people are going to demand their representatives to stand up on this issue.

Mr. President, we knew less when we voted last week than did the reporter from the Wall Street Journal. Mr. David Rogers started to research his article as a result of an exchange here on the floor, as I understand it. And that article, when completed, documented this mining activity only twenty-four hours after we had actually debated this issue.

It is, I think, an extremely important article. It was the first public revelation of the activity.

In that particular article, Mr. President, Mr. Rogers points out that the Reagan administration's role in mining of the Nicaraguan harbors is larger than previously disclosed. According to Roger's sources, > Units operating from a ship controlled by the Central Intelligence Agency in the Pacific participated in the operation. Though anti-Sandinista insurgents have claimed credit, a source familiar with the CIA briefings on the operation said that the units operating from the ship are self-contained and composed of Salvadorans and other Latin Americans from outside Nicaragua. The mines are described as acoustic devices triggered by the sounds of ships traveling in the port and planted by small boats operating from the large mother ship. The mining operation, which has targeted two Pacific ports, Corinto and Puerto Sandino have been bitterly protested by the Nicaraguan Government which has accused the United States of playing a major role.

> President Reagan, questioned about the matter in his news conference Wednesday, refused to comment. But the issue has provoked concern in Congress, even among those supporting CIA aid to the anti-Sandinista insurgents.

I daresay, Mr. President, that if the President, in his news conference, had at that time revealed what we now know, the actions by this body would have been very, very different. If we had had the information—it could have been made available to us, even in a confidential way—I am sure the vote in this body last week would have been very, very different.

Nonetheless, this body has now become familiar with this issue. If we had had that information, I daresay we would be in a very different situation.

Mr. President, I would like to continue with this. I see the Senator from Maine on the floor.

Mr. COHEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KENNEDY. I shall be glad to yield for a question or to yield to the Senator to make what comment he would like to make.

Mr. COHEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that, at the conclusion of my comments, the Senator from Massachusetts not lose his right to complete his statement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so orderd.

Mr. COHEN. Mr. President, last week, the Senate debated at length what is to be the nature and extent of our role in Central America. Contrary to some of the statements emanating from the White House, I believe that debate was not only healthy but vital. It is my personal judgment that subversive and terrorist activities in El Salvador, supported by Nicaragua and Cuba, do threaten to destabilize the region and that we have an interest and obligation to lend our support to those who represent the voices of moderation, reform, and democracy. That view is shared by an overwhelming majority of my colleagues who also believe that long-term solutions to that region's problems lie in economic and social assistance and not military intervention. And that is why the Senate rejected by wide margins the attempts to curtail or reduce the President's program.

The votes pertaining to our policies in Nicaragua were much closer. I submit that one reason—and, no doubt, there are many—is that there seems to be a growing disparity between our statements and our actions, between our goals and our tactics.

It is the official policy of our Government to provide so-called covert aid to the Nicaraguan Contras for the specific and limited purpose of interdicting the flow of arms between Nicaragua and El Salvador. We have declared that it is not our policy to overthrow the Sandinista government—whose legitimacy we have not challenged to date—but to pressure them to accept the basic goals of the Contadora process. I say fair enough.

Our problem, however, stems from the undeniable fact that we are supporting those whose express goal is the overthrow of the Sandinista government.

The plausibility of our position becomes immediately entangled in the briar patch of reality. We sustain the Contras but cannot control their activities. We give moral support, if not logistical assistance, to the mining of Nicaragua's harbors since—it can be argued—it will help interdict the flow of arms to El Salvador. Of course, we do not support the damaging or sinking of commercial vessels that are carrying grain and not guns. Yes, we know that mines cannot distinguish between commercial vessels and those laden with Soviet and Cuban weapons. We know that the mining of another nation's harbors—even if not technically a blockade—may nonetheless be treated by that nation as an act of belligerency—an act of war. Yet we have not declared war against Nicaragua and do not propose to do so.

The argument chases its tail around in circles.

With the destruction of each economic target in Nicaragua or in its harbors, our policy and its rationale becomes more tortured and tenuous.

We cannot remain benignly indifferent to the actions and activities of those whom we support and then claim that we are not accountable or responsible when they exceed our stated goals.

We cannot have one purpose and the Contras another without being forced to declare exactly what actions are deemed reprehensible and what beyond our condonation. For if we remain silent, or supremely ignorant, in the face of activities that we publicly declare to be in contravention of the letter and spirit of our laws, then we must assume constructive, if not active, responsibility for those actions. In law as in life, nonfeasance can be tantamount to malfeasance when there is a duty to take action. We cannot seek refuge behind the halo of ignorance or indifference.

If the very existence of the Sandinistas poses an unacceptable threat to the security and stability of Central America, then we must be courageous enough to declare it to be our policy to remove them, by force if necessary. If that is not to be our policy, then we cannot employ surrogates to carry out our secret designs while we proclaim to all the world that we are not responsible. Our words will carry the scent of lies not only to our enemies and allies—but most importantly to our own citizens.

President Reagan recently complained about congressional intrusion into foreign and military policy decisions. There can be no doubt that during the past decade, Congress has become far more active, and perhaps overreaching, in areas once considered the exclusive preserve of the executive branch.

Vietnam is cited as the principal source of this congressional agitation and activity that has been characterized as unwarranted, unwise, and unconstitutional by the last four Presidents. No doubt the wounds of that experience account for much of the restrictive and restraining legislation passed by Congress since 1973. But if Congress has overstepped its bounds, it has done so in reaction to Presidents who have stepped across constitutional lines since the end of World War II whenever it has been expedient to do so.

The "lessons of Vietnam" has become a catch phrase seized upon by every politician and political commentator with a podium or word processor. There were, of course, many lessons, ranging from the conceptual and tactical to the constitutional and moral. The central lesson was not that American power should never be used to defend the interests of those removed or remote from the United States. Rather, it was that we should never commit American sons to fight and die in distant lands unless we can persuade the country and the Congress that it is in our vital interest to do so.

Without securing public support, the skull of defeat will be visible beneath any surface display of power.

Free people can be convinced to support a worthy policy; their voices, however, can never be silenced if they remain unconvinced of its worthiness.

When a policy is ambiguous or opaque or where alternative measures, short of military or paramilitary activities, appear desirable, then efforts to rally support for a President by verbal bullying will fail. Casting blame is not a substitute for the heavy responsibility and difficult task of persuading a free people to open their eyes and minds to near- or long-term dangers. Hurling accusations over who lost Lebanon will not produce open checkbooks and closed mouths in Congress.

Winston Churchill failed in his visionary efforts to rally the British people to prepare for a gathering of Hitler's storm troopers. His inspiring eloquence—and American assistance—helped to save Western Europe from defeat.

Ronald Reagan's greatest talent is his power to communicate and persuade. His task is to define the threat we face in Central America, propose clear and specific policies to deal with it, and openly persuade the country and Congress to support those policies.

When our policies remain unclear or where there appears to be a significant disparity between what we preach and what is practiced, then congressional criticism and intervention are inevitable. Long ago, we rejected the cynical proposition that the country should "watch what we do, not what we say." We should also reject the notion that the country should listen to what is being said and not watch what is being done.

I thank the Senator for yielding and yield back to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. CRANSTON. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. KENNEDY. I would be glad to yield for the purpose of answering a question without losing my right to the floor.

Mr. CRANSTON. I have several questions I want to ask the Senator from Massachusetts, whom I applaud for focusing the attention of the Senate and the Nation on the unpleasant developments in Central America. First, is not a blockade of the sort that we are financing and apparently directly and indirectly engaging in an act of war under international concepts of law?

Mr. KENNEDY. The Senator is correct. I know the Senator is familiar with the statement opposing the covert intervention in Nicaragua that has been signed by a number of the most distinguished international law professors in this country. That statement reviews the whole jurisdictional issue. Certainly the activity of the mining falls very clearly within the kind of situation which is referred to in their statement.

The Senator is quite correct, and it is not only the opinion of the Senator from California and the Senator from Massachusetts but it is that of a number of the most distinguished international authorities as well.

As a matter of fact, as the Senator from California is probably aware, ordinarily a blockade is an announced policy so all nations will know about it. Historically, that has been the precedent. And, of course, that has not been the case at all under this circumstance, so foreign shipping has been totally unaware of the existence of these mines.

Mr. CRANSTON. Would the Senator feel also that the actions in backing the blockade and other actions that we are carrying on from north, south, east, and west against Nicaragua amount to our backing terrorism?

Mr. KENNEDY. There is no question, I say to the Senator, that if a number of the activities in which the Contras have been involved were committed by some group against similar targets in the United States, such activity would be labeled as terrorist activity. What I am referring to now is the blowing up of farm cooperatives, the indiscriminate shelling of small villages, the killing of school teachers, peasants in Central America, what would be considered innocent farmers in Nicaragua under attack by concentrations of military. There is I think a very significant series of activities in which the Contras have been involved which would fall within what I would guess the average American would consider to be terrorist activity. What we do not know, nor did we know last week, is the extent of the CIA involvement in those various land assaults and attacks. What we do know now, which we did not have before the Senate last week, is the very clear evidence that the Central Intelligence Agency was very much involved in the planning, the directing, and the supervision of the laying of those mines, not only in ports that has some degree of proximity to Nicaragua but in one of those ports on the opposite side of the isthmus from El Salvador. It would take a fanciful imagination to believe that El Bluff was being used as a port for the export of military equipment and guns for El Salvador. It would be very circuitous at best.

Mr. CRANSTON. I would like to ask, does the Senator from Massachusetts see analogies between what happened in Lebanon and what is now happening in Central America in this respect: In Lebanon, Congress was induced over my opposition and the opposition of the Senator from Massachusetts to give the President a blank check for 18 months in Lebanon. The original purpose of that mission was to provide cover while Israeli forces, Syrian forces and PLO forces withdrew from Lebanon. Then the mission changed and we found ourselves involved in one side in that civil war and it was our involvement in one side in that civil war that probably in part led to the attacks on the marines that led to so many American deaths.

Similarly, in Central America, the President has stated that we were engaging in the effort in regard to Nicaragua to halt their supplying of the rebels in El Salvador, but in the letter that was written to Senator BAKER a few days ago, supposedly spelling out our limited objectives, the President first said:

> We do not seek to destabilize or overthrow the Government of Nicaragua.

But then he wrote:

> We are trying, among other things, to bring the Sandinistas into meaningful negotiations and construct verifiable agreements with their neighbors on peace in the region.

Anthony Lewis in today's New York Times said:

> Consider what that sentence means, even apart from the elusive phrase "among other things." It means that the present American Government claims the right to support bombing, burning of villages, shooting of civilians and mining of harbors in order to make an internationally recognized government enter into what we consider "meaningful negotiations."
> Is that a principle that will benefit American interests in the long run? Are we going to gain if the world adopts the view that terrorism is justified in aid of diplomacy? That did not use to be the accepted definition of American interests.

Does the Senator agree that there are these very unpleasant analogies between what occurred in the change in mission in Lebanon and now apparently a change in mission in relationship to Nicaragua?

Mr. KENNEDY. I would. I think it is important, when we are considering the foreign policy issues as they relate to Lebanon, to recognize that the vote in this body was 54 to 46, virtually evenly divided, and that there were a number of Members in this body who raised serious questions about administration policy as it altered and changed and developed in ways which were never really adequately expressed or explained or approved by this body.

I daresay if the administration had listened to those who had a different view, an alternative view from the administration, there would not have been the loss of the American lives. But I think the Senator raises the whole issue of decisionmaking processes in this body in foreign policy. It would appear that the administration or this President would want to make all the decisions and the Congress of the United States would only rubberstamp him. That is a system which is more in tune with the Soviet system than it is in the United States.

I have heard it also suggested that once there has been some form of action, we ought to have confidential communications to the administration. Well, if we followed that procedure, after the Gulf of Tonkin there would have been no debate, no discussion, no dialog in the Senate, no action in our involvement in Southeast Asia. Clearly, that is not what our Founding Fathers intended. So I think the Senator from California has made a very legitimate and worthwhile point. It is one that I welcome at this point in the dialog.

Mr. CRANSTON. I thank the Senator.

I have a question with reference to the analogy to Lebanon.

Mr. KENNEDY. I yield for the purpose of a question, without losing my right to the floor.

Mr. CRANSTON. Many of us were startled yesterday to read in the New York Times the revelation from unnamed officials in the Reagan administration that we have contingency plans for the sending of troops into action in Central America. Of course, the Pentagon has contingency plans for just about every circumstance you can dream up, and that is by no means unusual. But when you see the contingency plans that are apparently designed for military actions to persuade Members of Congress and people in the country to support the President's policy objectives, that is a new and different and improper use of contingency plans.

I today asked the Foreign Relations Committee—and Senator DODD joined me in this—to hold an immediate session to obtain from the Reagan administration immediately the full details and purposes of its so-called contingency plans for Central America. We will have that meeting tomorrow, for starters.

Secretary Weinberger has now denied that there are any such contingency plans, so we have administration statements on both sides of the issue. It seems to me that this could be Ronald Reagan's Lebanon ploy all over again. The administration may be trying to intimidate Congress into doing what it wishes or giving it a blank check to do what it wishes by, in effect, saying, "Vote our way or we will send down U.S. troops, and we will blame Congress if some of them get killed."

Administration officials, in the New York Times story yesterday, admit that they are deliberately talking openly about military plans for Central America in hopes of pressuring Congress into rubberstamping military aid for El Salvador and those that are providing assistance to the terrorists in Nicaragua.

Does the Senator see in that an abuse of contingency plans and an analogy, again, to what happened in regard to Lebanon?

Mr. KENNEDY. I think the Senator has made a very valid and worthwhile point this evening, as he did last week when this body debated the whole issue of the introduction of combat troops for the purpose of combat in or over El Salvador. That record would indicate that there has been a gradual escalation in terms of military activity performed by American servicemen.

The Senate last week, in a series of votes, showed increasing apprehension about the possibility of committing those combat troops without prior authorization by Congress.

It seems to me that the Senator from California and the Senator from Connecticut have acted very wisely to ascertain the exact nature of the administration's contingency plans, and this would be something which will be enormously helpful and revealing.

It seems that the more we find out about administration policy, the more we find there is escalation of American presence.

I think if there is one fact which is very clear, it is the very grave concern the American people have about taking that step that will involve American young men, and perhaps even women, in a jungle war in Central America.

The Senator from California, the Senator from Vermont, the Senator from New Hampshire, the Senator from Connecticut, the Senator from Tennessee, and others during the debate and the discussion have cautioned about that evolutionary process; and what we are finding out is that this evening we have more information, solid information, direct information about the continuing escalation.

It would be enormously valuable to have the kind of material that the Senator from California and the Senator from Connecticut (Mr. DODD) have requested. I certainly hope it would be made available and that the Senator will share it with Members of this body.

Mr. CRANSTON. I thank the Senator very much for his responses. I have many more questions I might ask, but I know that the Senator from Vermont has his own thoughts to express or questions to ask, so I will not go on.

Let me say, however, that the Senator from Massachusetts has responded pretty much as I would, had the parliamentary situation permitted me to make statements rather than to ask questions. I thank him very much.

Mr. KENNEDY. I thank the Senator from California for his strong support on these issues and the efforts he has made in analyzing administration policy in Central America.

Mr. President, I send a modification of my amendment to the desk and demand a division.

The first division shall be lines 1 through 6, dealing with the mining of the harbors of Nicaragua.

The second division shall be lines 7 to 11, dealing with jurisdiction through the World Court.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment is so modified.

The amendment, as modified, is as follows:

At the appropriate place in the Dole amendment, add the following new section:

"SEC. . It is the sense of the Congress that—

"(a) No funds heretofore or hereafter appropriated in any Act of Congress shall be obligated or expended for the purpose of planning, directing, executing, or supporting the mining of the ports or territorial waters of Nicaragua.

"(b) The United States shall immediately withdraw the modification submitted on April 6, 1984 to the jurisdiction of the International Court of Justice over the United States with respect to disputes with any Central American state or arising out of or related to events in Central America."

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I have had Members of this body speak to me recently indicating that they, too, have very serious reservations about the U.S.-sponsored mining of the harbors of Nicaragua; that they, too, are shocked by the revelations that have been made clear over the period of these past few days about U.S. involvement in the mining of the harbors; that they, too, are distressed, as all of us must be, by the fact that that kind of information was not available to us at a time when the Members were making a judgment as to what kind of aid and assistance we were going to provide to the Contras and what kind of support we were going to give the Contras in the debate this past week.

Mr. President, I am glad there has been some reference to the letter that was sent by the President of the United States to this body last week, trying to allay some of the fears that a number of Members of this body had about the American involvement in disrupting the Nicaraguan Government and the infrastructure, with the various assaults on farm cooperatives and schools, and even the airport had been mentioned during the dialog and debate.

During that debate last week, there was a passing reference to the mining activities in the harbors, but it appeared at the time when we finally did reach a vote that most Members of this body felt that with the statement that emanated from the White House, somehow the United States was not involved in this mining activity. Many Members felt that the statement they received last week from the White House—just prior to the time that the President had his press conference—that somehow all the aid and assistance that was being provided to the Contras was just being used to interdict the arms supply that was going to El Salvador through Nicaragua.

Mr. President, for those who are now focusing on the other provision of this amendment, I shall review the second provision, lines 7 to 11. Statements were made by the distinguished group of international lawyers. I believe now we will have much greater attention of the Members of this body on this whole issue of the legality of American involvement in support of the Contras and support of the mining of the harbors in Nicaragua. This statement points out that, and I am quoting:

> Now that President Reagan reported authorization of a plan to covertly destabilize the internationally recognized Government of Nicaragua is a serious and dangerous act of aggression.

I just depart here for a moment. I would think that any examination of the mining operation would have to fall within the definition of "destabilization." I do not see how you can consider otherwise the action of the Central Intelligence Agency in interrupting the sealanes in ways which have brought about the loss of life to fishermen and the serious injury to not only Nicaraguans but to a number of our allies, Panama, for example, and other nations which are our friends. I think any reasonable interpretation of the word "destabilize" would have to include the kinds of activities which we are involved in in mining of the harbors let alone the other examples which I have already read into the RECORD.

Clearly what we are talking when we use the word "destabilization" is activity aimed at the economic infrastructure, activity that brings death and destruction to innocent civilians. I would use that definition of "destabilization" to be activity aimed at destroying the economic infrastructure and activity that does result in the death and the destruction to innocent civilians.

To get back to the statement, "The plan to overtly destabilize the internationally recognized Government of Nicaragua is a serious and dangerous act of aggression."

I am departing here, Mr. President. No one doubts that we have recognized Nicaragua. No one really questions in this body that we are in the process of the exchange of ambassadors. Our Ambassador is there. They have at least indicated to us who their new ambassador might be. But we have an ambassador. We do have diplomatic relations. So this is an internationally recognized government. Certainly it is a government which we in the United States have recognized, that is, the Government of Nicaragua.

And that is a serious and dangerous act of aggression and a policy of covert intervention against a sovereign nation that fundamentally violates international law as set out in the Charter of the United Nations, and the Charter of the Organization of American States, article 15, both ratified by the United States. This covert operation contradicts the democratic ideals of the United States and the principle that a people have a right to determine their own future.

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, will the Senator from Massachusetts yield for a question?

Mr. KENNEDY. I am glad to yield for a question with the understanding that this response will appear at an appropriate place not to interfere with the comments on this statement by the international lawyers.

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, I was shocked and deeply dismayed by the administration's decision not to accept the jurisdiction of the World Court in disputes involving Central America for the next 2 years. I have had my differences with the administration over its Central America policies, but even staunch supporters of these policies should pause to reflect on the dire implications of the administration's refusal to go to court, if necessary, to defend its actions.

First of all, the administration's decision gives the impression, correctly or not, that the United States would lose any case brought against it over the mining of Nicaraguan harbors. Such an impression, in turn, could lead the world to conclude that the American commitment to the World Court is valid only if our position is likely to prevail. In that event, America's leadership in the fragile effort to advance the rule of law in international affairs would be severely undermined.

Second, the administration's actions threaten to destroy the effectiveness of the World Court in dealing with cases that the United States may take to the Court in the future. The administration has, in effect, invited the rest of the world to refuse to defend against suits brought by the United States if responding to American grievances would be in any way inconvenient. I do not understand why the administration would want to risk such damage to our long-range interests for the sake of a highly questionable short-term gain. If ever there were a case of throwing the baby out with the bath water, this is it.

Accordingly, I call upon the President to get the United States back on its traditional course by reversing this unwise decision. If America is back and standing tall, that should apply to conciliation as well as confrontation.

Was the Senator from Massachusetts shocked and dismayed as I was by the administration's decision not to accept the jurisdiction of the World Court in disputes involving Central America for the next couple of years?

Mr. KENNEDY. I would certainly agree with the ranking minority member of the Foreign Relations Committee. Back in 1946, with the understanding and the virtual unanimous agreement in the Senate, we indicated that if the United States were going to withdraw, we were going to give a 6-month notice. What has happened now is the administration quietly, so to speak, at 4 o'clock last Friday afternoon, without any public statement did notify the U.N. that we were going to exclude the United States from the jurisdiction of the World Court with respect to disputes with Central American nations.

I had the opportunity to attend the International Law School at The Hague for a number of months. The International Court of Justice is extremely wary about involving itself in national disputes or controversies. It has also spoken out, however, on a number of issues involving international seaways. I remember back from that period of study the famous Corfu Channel case which was one of the most important international cases adjudicating the rights to international waterways.

And what we are talking about tonight is international law. And I certainly welcome the comments of the Senator.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Massachusetts yield?

Mr. KENNEDY. I yield for a question without losing the right to the floor.

Mr. DOLE. The Senator indicated to me privately that he would agree to a 20-minute time agreement. He has had the floor now 1 hour and 10 minutes. It is frustrating since we are trying to take deficit reduction action on the floor, to get some totally nongermane amendment that has nothing to do with the tax bill or any spending provision in the bill and then frustrate the will of the Senate to act on deficit reduction. I assume we are now orchestrating a number of speakers.

Is there any idea how long this nongermane action may continue?

Mr. KENNEDY. As I indicated to the chairman of the committee I was glad to introduce this amendment this evening, to ask consent to set it aside so that other amendments could be considered, be disposed of and voted on, I offered to enter into a time agreement with the Senator from Kansas for a 40-minute time limitation at the time the Senate comes back in and when this legislation is laid before the Senate tomorrow, the time to be evenly divided. I would still be glad to accede to that. All I would like to do is get a vote on this amendment.

Mr. DOLE. We are ready to vote now. If the Senator will yield, we had less than 2 hours today on the tax bill; we have had about the same amount on the amendment.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I believe I do have the floor. I am glad to yield for a question and I am glad to reiterate the position that I have taken earlier. I am prepared to ask consent to set aside this amendment, so that we can move ahead on other matters, with the understanding that we could have a 40-minute time limitation on this measure when the Senate convenes tomorrow.

I would certainly be willing to agree to that if the ranking minority member of the committee so desires. I would still follow that procedure where I would ask consent if the Senator had another amendment to consider and dispose of, or other amendments. I am quite prepared to stay here whatever time the Senator from Kansas wishes to stay and the Senate is prepared to stay so that we could dispose of other matters, and then have this the pending business with a 40-minute time limitation when the bill is laid before the Senate tomorrow with the time evenly divided between the Senator from Kansas and the Senator from Massachusetts. if that was the desire of the floor manager, I would certainly support that particular measure.

So I think it is important to understand that we are just interested in being able to get a vote at a time when there is enough notification to the Members on this important issue.

I just indicate that that is at least my desire at this time.

Mr. LEAHY. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. KENNEDY. I yield for a question with the understanding that I do not lose my right to the floor.

Mr. LEAHY. Is it the Senator's understanding that in the first section of his amendment, section A, that had we voted and passed and had signed into law the amendment last week on terrorism relating to Nicaragua, this amendment would not have been necessary?

Mr. KENNEDY. I certainly am of that opinion. I think the Senator from Vermont was here when we debated the whole issue of terrorism.

Tonight, there is something being made of the issue of time. Last week, we waited, I believe, for 40 minutes or so until we got that letter from the White House. We waited around here for some 40 minutes until we got a letter from the White House that indicated that the administration sought to interdict the arms supply from Nicaragua to El Salvador and has no intention to disrupt or undermine the governmental activities of Nicaragua.

I think what the Senator is saying at this time is exactly the case. I think if the Members of this body had the kind of facts that we have at the present time, the votes would have been different.

That is all I am trying to do. As a matter of fact, this is just a sense-of-the-Senate resolution. I wish we would be able to somehow bring that bill back from last week so that we could actually have an amendment which would do that. But we cannot do it.

But it does seem to me that we have some responsibility in this body to speak to this issue.

Mr. LEAHY. Will the Senator yield further for a question without losing his right to the floor?

Mr. KENNEDY. Yes, without losing my right to the floor.

Mr. LEAHY. Is it the Senator's understanding that there were some—I emphasize the word "some"—Senators who voted last week that might not have been aware of the involvement of the U.S. Government in the mining activity but, conversely, it would be the Senator's understanding that there were some who may have voted either way who had been aware of that?

Mr. KENNEDY. The Senator is quite correct in his observation, because the Senator is very much involved and engaged in dialogs with a number of our colleagues here on the floor of the Senate and off the Senate floor on this issue. I think the Senator is quite correct in maintaining that this kind of information that is available today on a Monday, 4 days after the Senate was debating this kind of issue of last week, it would have been halted. I do not think there is really much question about it.

What we are trying to do with this amendment is to indicate to the American people that that is our position. I know it may be difficult for some to vote in support of this particular amendment, given their opposition to other amendments last week, but I would daresay that it might be the case.

If we could have the attention of the Senator from Kansas, if there is any desire by the Senator from Kansas to consider a 30-minute time agreement tomorrow, to be equally divided, on this issue, I think we could, with the record that is being built tonight and with the information that is available to the Members on tomorrow, I think the Members of this body could make an informed judgment on this issue sometime tomorrow. I would be glad to accede to that kind of a limitation.

Mr. DOLE. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, without losing my right to the floor, I am glad to yield.

Mr. DOLE. As I understand it, the amendment has now been divided.

Mr. KENNEDY. The Senator is correct. The amendment has been divided. And what we could do is have one time agreement and then vote on the two different amendments. As I say, I am glad to reach a vote on this particular measure on tomorrow. I reiterate, I would ask that it be set aside if the chairman of the committee wants to consider other amendments this evening. Otherwise, I am quite prepared, and I see a number of my colleagues here prepared, to continue to explore this issue with the Members of the Senate. But I am quite prepared to see a disposition of this matter.

I do feel strongly that it is an issue which the Senate should address. I know that the Senator from Kansas wants to move ahead with the legislation. I do not want to interfere with that. But I do feel that, on this matter of importance, we ought to have at least time enough so that the Members of this body have a chance to examine the record this evening.

Mr. DOLE. As I understand, the Senator from Massachusetts is talking about 30 minutes for the package, equally divided; is that correct?

Mr. KENNEDY. Yes.

Mr. DOLE. Fifteen minutes to a side?

Mr. KENNEDY. The Senator is correct.

Mr. DOLE. Maybe the Senator can talk while I confer with the leader, unless the Senator desires a quorum call.

Mr. KENNEDY. I had an amendment last week which I wish that I had offered that said nothing in this supplemental will in any way be used that violates any of our treaty obligations. Actually, we had a 20-minute limitation on that particular measure. I wish I had offered that amendment now because it becomes even clearer, Mr. President, with these revelations that we are in violation of some basic and fundamental treaties. That is something that had concerned me previously and something which has bothered me at the present time.

Basically, what the article which I referred to with regards to our signing the Organization of American States is the article 15. And that prohibits direct or indirect intervention into the internal affairs of any state. It violates section 2, paragraph 4, of the charter of the United Nations. That provision prohibits the threat or use of force against the territorial integrity or political independence of any state.

Quite clearly, Mr. President, with those two provisions—one dealing with the Organization of American States, the other with regard to the United Nations—I think that the kind of activity, such as in this instance the mining of the harbor, would fall within that particular category. Those were the two provisions that are mentioned in this particular statement by the lawyers.

Mr. President, I also mention that beyond the United Nations, article II, section 4, there is the charter of the Organization of American States both of which I refer to. I think a fair reading of the Rio Treaty—which is a very basic document in terms of the relationship between countries in this hemisphere and is referred to regularly by the chiefs of states of the countries of the Americas as basically being a fundamental document, a Magna Carta, if you will, for the behavior of the countries of the Americas—of which we are a signatory, will indicate that article I points out that the high contracting parties formally condemn war and undertake their international relations not to resort to the threat or the use of force or in any manner inconsistent with the provisions of the Charter of the United Nations and this treaty. Then it goes on.

I will go on with article II, which has the relevant matters, just after I engage in responding to the question from the Senator from New Mexico.

I would be glad to yield to the Senator from New Mexico without losing my right.

Mr. BINGAMAN. Will the Senator from Massachusetts yield for a question?

I saw in the press the reaction of some of our allies to the reported information about the mining of harbors in Nicaragua. I was not exactly sure what that reaction was, nor what our allies were concerned about. Does the Senator from Massachusetts have information about the reaction or response that some of our allies had made to these reports?

Mr. KENNEDY. Senator, the best information that has been available to me is the kind of information that has been available to the Members of this body. Foreign Minister Cheysson of France has indicated that the French Government was seriously considering the sending of some kind of a mission to Nicaragua to help the Government of Nicaragua to sweep the various acoustic mines which have been placed by the Central Intelligence Agency.

That story surfaced over the period of this weekend. Then we had Geoffrey Howe, the Foreign Minister of Great Britain, who also indicated in statements over the weekend that Britain, in its long and continuing commitment to the international law of the seas, the freedom of navigation, and also, quite frankly, on the basic issue of the subversion of the country, had indicated that they were reviewing within their Cabinet what action, if any, they might take.

They have been somewhat more cautious. But the message has been very clear; that is, that among two of our staunchest allies today this kind of activity is the kind of activity that will bring further tension and further division within the alliance at a time when we are looking for increasing cooperation and increasing strength for the United States and its allies in Western Europe.

Mr. BINGAMAN. Would the Senator yield for a further question?

Mr. KENNEDY. I would yield for a question without losing my right to the floor.

Mr. BINGAMAN. Is there any precedent in our own history for the mining of harbors? Has the Senator from Massachusetts had occasion to determine whether the United States has ever experienced this type of hostile act by any other country and/or has been in a position where it was forced to either respond in some way diplomatically or militarily or take economic sanctions?

Mr. KENNEDY. The Senator has asked a very good question, and I hope that we will have an opportunity to add to the record on this issue. But some of those incidents, which come clearly to mind, are the Cuban missile blockade. It was a quarantine of Cuba with notification and public declaration, and an outright statement by the President of the United States.

Going back in history even further, there were activities which were commenced by the North during the Civil War, and which again was a stated policy. The Northern military command blockaded certain harbors in the South in order to interdict the mercantile enterprises of the South, and to cause some economic disruption in the South.

I understand that was a matter which was publicly stated as a matter of policy. Again, there was at that time, as the Senator well knows, a war going on. But still there was the public declaration, and the public statement.

Mr. BINGAMAN. I would ask if the Senator would yield for one final question.

Would you have any knowledge or opinion as to the reaction that we would be getting from some of the Contadora nations with regard to this new information about involvement in the mining of harbors in a Central American country? I do not know if the Contadora countries have explicitly dealt with that kind of activity in any of their pronouncements, or in the goals that they have set to achieve in the Contadora process, which we have publicly endorsed on numerous occasions—and the President has endorsed—or if this is an activity that they have contemplated in any respect. I would be interested in the Senator's opinion on that. I appreciate him yielding for these questions.

Mr. KENNEDY. I know of no statement that has been issued by the Contadora countries themselves on this particular activity. The Senator knows, as well as I, that this is a matter which has been raised in the last 2 to 3 days.

I thank the Senator for raising these questions because we are talking, as the Senator from New Mexico has pointed out, not only about the activities of the United States, direct support of the mining of these harbors, and the basic disruption and undermining of a sovereign nation, but we are talking about division within the alliance.

The Senator from New Mexico has brought up a very valid point. I think we could imagine, unless we were going to bring a halt to this process and this procedure, that we could foresee the possibility where we had Central Intelligence Agency-supported seacraft and naval craft distributing these mines.

Mr. President, the Senate is not in order. I am sure they want to hear what I have to say.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DENTON). The Senate will be in order.

Mr. KENNEDY. They are out dropping these mines at the same time the French are in the process of picking up these mines. What a spectacle that will be.

Mr. MELCHER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I will be glad to yield for a question, with the understanding that I do not lose my right to the floor.

Mr. MELCHER. Mr. President, I ask the Senator from Massachusetts if he does not feel this is the time-honored method and traditional method for the Senate to debate an issue, to determine what are the possibilities of bipartisan support of the executive actions, whatever they may be, in the case of the mining of the harbor in Nicaragua, as has been alleged, under CIA auspices.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, my response to the Senator from Montana is, definitely so. It certainly should not be an issue which has any ring to partisanship.

What we are talking about here is the issue of international law, in the one case, and that is the second provision of the amendment I have put forward, and the adherence to agreements to which we have been signatories, under the second case.

Under the first case, with regard to the mining itself, for the reasons I have outlined earlier with regard to international law, the U.N. document, the Organization of American States, to which we are signatories, and the Rio Treaty, I find it difficult to see how we could possibly make the case that with this kind of activity, we were not violating international law. The case was made last week, during the course of the debate, that the kinds of activities which the Contras were involved in may not in themselves violate international law. I had some exchange on that issue during the course of the debate on terminating the economic support for the country.

However, I dare say that the information that has come to light over the past 3 days, which implicates the United States in a very direct way with American taxpayers' funds involved in the intelligence activity and the planting of those mines, it is difficult for me to think that anyone in this body could make the case that we are not violating international law. That should not be an issue of partisanship.

The Senator from Montana makes a very good case that this should not be an issue of partisanship. It should be an issue of bipartisanship. What we should be willing to do in this body is to submit this issue, if we believe we are right, to have the appropriate adjudication.

There were Members on this floor last week who believed the law favored their side, and they were supporting the administration's position and activity. That being so, it seems to me that they should be willing to submit it to the International Court of Justice. But now they have indicated that they would not be willing to submit it to the International Court of Justice, nor would they be willing to follow the process and procedures which have been carefully defined at an earlier period of time for the withdrawal of jurisdiction for a particular case or controversy, which, as I have indicated earlier, would require a 6-month notification.

The administration moved ahead with apparently an immediate notification and expect that to be respected.

Mr. President, I would be glad to yield again to the Senator from Montana, without losing my right to the floor, if he has any questions.

Mr. MELCHER. I thank the Senator.

I ask the Senator from Massachusetts the following question: It is my understanding that the amendment of the Senator has been divided and that the first part (a) deals with the money that would be spent for such a purpose as mining the ports or territorial waters of Nicaragua; and the second deals with the question of whether or not modifications submitted on April 6, 1984, to the jurisdiction of the International Court of Justice, should be withdrawn by the executive branch of Government.

So my question is as follows: Does this not give the perfect opportunity for the Senate to act upon two separate issues, one being the purse strings, which is the responsibility of Congress, on how money is spent, and the second being the question of abiding by the treaties which put this question before the International Court of Justice?

Mr. KENNEDY. The Senator is quite correct.

As I indicated when I sent the amendment to the desk, this amendment involves very important policy considerations. But important as those policy considerations are, it is an issue which the Members can grasp readily.

The Senator from Montana understands completely what is included in this particular amendment and has stated so to this body with his last comments. It involves issues which this body had basically debated over the period of the last week, and that is why it seemed to me that we could move toward an early consideration of the amendment.

Once the Members are familiar with the substance of it and understand it, then I am convinced that we can get an accurate reflection of the sentiment of the Members of this body.

Mr. SASSER. Will the Senator from Massachusetts yield to me?

Mr. KENNEDY. I shall be glad to yield, Mr. President, with the understanding that I not lose my right to the floor and that I yield for a question.

Mr. SASSER. Mr. President, I have been interested in hearing the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts outline the thoughts and reactions of the various legal scholars relative to the mining of the harbors of Nicaragua. My question to the Senator is, Has he had occasion to read or hear the statement of the Foreign Minister Cheysson of France, dealing with the mining of harbors? This is the statement by the French Foreign Minister.

One feels cast down not only on the level of international relations, but also on the moral level. And one can only react with horror knowing that the mining of Nicaraguan ports means that women, children, and the dispossessed of Nicaragua are being deprived of the provisions of medications supplied by the international humanitarian aid. Several shipments, some of which came from Europe, have been annulled and sent elsewhere.

Continuing, he says:

It is also distressing, given that we are witnessing a watershed to a new stage in the escalation of clandestine military operations supported from outside Nicaragua.

I was curious if the Senator from Massachusetts is aware of this statement by the Foreign Minister of France and his reaction that the mining of the Nicaraguan harbors not only cast down the level of international relations but also cast down the moral level of international relations.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I must say in response to the Senator from Tennessee that I had seen excerpts of that statement, but I had not read nor heard that statement in its entirety. I believe that what that statement basically says is, if we had found that from one of our oldest and truest allies, France, and we have heard similar comments or statements made by the Foreign Minister, Sir Geoffrey Howe, of Great Britain, what are we going to find from other allies, or at least those countries in the world whose support the United States is attempting to win because of important considerations with regard to the security interests of ourselves and other allies?

If our oldest allies are going to be as critical as these two countries have been on this particular issue, does not the Senator from Tennessee agree with me that at least we ought to be afforded the opportunity to go on record and express our view here, in the U.S. Senate, on this issue? Does he not agree with me that we ought to be able to have at least some opportunity to express our view about this particular issue?

I ask this basically rhetorically, Mr. President, because I know what the Senator has said that he agrees with me on that issue.

Mr. SASSER. Would the Senator yield?

Mr. DOLE. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I shall be glad to yield to the Senator from Kansas for a question and without losing my right to the floor.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I think it is obvious that we are either going to have to stay here all night or agree to do this tomorrow. I share the view expressed earlier by the distinguished minority leader about these kinds of amendments. I quote the distinguished Senator from West Virginia:

I do not support the kind of amendments to which the distinguished Senator from Kansas has alluded. I certainly have no interest in supporting amendments that deal with the foreign policy of this country or any other subject matter that is clearly out of the direct or indirect line of amendments that might—and that is where it tails off.

I share that view expressed by the minority leader earlier today, who implored us not to file cloture. But it seems that that was just one side of it. We were not supposed to file cloture, but we obviously cannot prevent nongermane amendments. Based on what I consider to be an accurate reflection of the view of most Members, I think it may be the better part of wisdom to agree to a time limit tomorrow afternoon, to vote either up or down or on a tabling motion on the amendment and get on with the deficit reduction.

I think the American taxpayers are a little concerned about getting around to a deficit reduction. If some on that side want to block deficit reduction, they can keep offering nongermane amendments. We have consumed today with only one vote on the tax bill. Obviously, we could be here all night and not get another vote on the tax bill. So I suggest to the majority leader that we reach some agreement in hopes that we get back to the tax bill sometime later this week.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, does the Senator from Massachusetts have the floor?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts has the floor. He yielded to the Senator from Kansas for a question without losing his right to the floor.

Mr. BAKER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to me?

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, what the Chair says is true. I just wanted to respond to the floor manager of the bill that I took the liberty prior to offering this amendment, being aware of the statements that had been made to the minority leader, to notify him and communicate that it was my desire to do so. He can speak for himself on his reaction to it, but I made it very clear to him that, had there been strong objection by the majority leader, the Senator from Massachusetts might well follow a different path. I shall let him speak for himself on this issue, and we are where we are. I hope we can work out a time for consideration of the amendment.

Did the majority leader want me to yield to him for purposes of a question? I shall be glad to do that for a question without losing my right to the floor.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senator may yield to me in general without losing his right to the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, what I have in mind is not really a question, it is really a statement. I do not think there is any point in trying to argue the situation from this morning. There is no reason to quarrel with the Senator from Massachusetts for offering this amendment. He has the right to do that.

I said earlier that I am disappointed that after our colloquy this morning, we find ourselves almost instantly involved with a nongermane amendment. But that is water under the bridge and the Senator properly says we are where we are, and where we are is a mess as far as the tax bill is concerned.

That is beside the point. The Senator from Massachusetts earlier said he would like to set aside this amendment and go to something else. I indicated on the floor that I was not willing to do that. Indeed, I was not. I do not think there is much purpose to be served by continuing this tonight, and I am prepared to go out. If the distinguished minority leader is within earshot and cares to come to the floor, we will try to arrange the schedule for tomorrow. But when we resume consideration of this bill, the pending question once more will be the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts. If the Senator wishes to suggest a time limitation on it and if it is cleared on the other side, I will be glad to consider that. But absent that, it is the intention of the leadership on this side to ask the Senate to recess over until tomorrow at 3 p.m. I may say, by the way, that I regret we have to come in so late, but tomorrow is the memorial service for our late colleague, Senator Church, at the National Cathedral beginning at 11 a.m. Tomorrow is Tuesday and both parties will be in caucus. As we usually do on Tuesday, it is necessary to recess for about 2 hours to accommodate Senators for that purpose.

In addition, Mr. President, we have requests for special orders, part of them having been put off for a great length of time. I am told there are nine requests for 15-minute special orders, so in doing what I am about to do it almost guarantees that we are going to be here until midnight tomorrow night. I do not think we have any alternative. In deference to the circumstances and facts I have recited, I think we simply have to be prepared for that. But it looks like it will be 5 p.m. or 5:30 before we get back on this bill tomorrow. Under those circumstances, if the Senator wishes to suggest a time for further debate on this amendment, as divided, I am willing to try to enter into an arrangement. As I say, I would not want to do that until the minority leader reaches the floor or indicates to me that he has no need to be on the floor.

Mr. KENNEDY. I want to indicate to the majority leader what I stated earlier today, and that is that I was prepared to set this aside so we could consider other measures on this legislation or that I was prepared to agree to a half-hour time limitation on this amendment—the time has now been divided between the Senator from Kansas and myself—and to proceed hopefully to a vote on it. But if not a vote on it, then a procedural vote that would reflect the merits of it after that time has expired. That is still my position. So when the minority leader is present, if such a request is made, I will not object to that proposal and hopefully with the RECORD that was made this evening the Members would be on notice about this particular measure and we could get a vote on it.

Mr. BAKER. The minority leader is not yet here.

Mr. KENNEDY. Under the same terms I yield to the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator yield on the same terms as before?

Mr. BAKER. I would suggest the absence of a quorum—I see the minority leader is at the door so I will not have to do that.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, with the understanding that I will not lose the right to the floor after the quorum——

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I hope the Senator will not suggest the absence of a quorum. Maybe the Chair will bear with us just for a moment while we do this.

Mr. KENNEDY. I will continue, Mr. President.

I would, Mr. President, like to insure that a part of the RECORD this evening will include this affidavit on the issue of terrorism by the Contras. I will read a sworn affidavit by Rev. Robert Stark, who has been working in Nicaragua. The affidavit describes several incidents that can only be viewed as violence aimed at innocent civilians. The statement starts off:

I, Rev. Robert Stark, first being duly sworn, hereby state as follows:

It is an affidavit subscribed and sworn to on the 20th day of October 1983, and notarized.

For the past two years I have been helping minister to the Catholic Parish of Cristo Rey in Nicaragua. This parish has been the victim of increasing attacks against civilian populations by anti-Sandinista forces.

On March 3, 1982, the pastor of this parish, who is also a North American priest, plus thirty men, women and children, along with myself, were all held captive by armed anti-Sandinista forces. While held with guns to our heads inside a small mountain chapel, we were witness to the brutal murder of one of our parish's main lay ministers, a Mr. Perez. Mr. Perez was a well-loved and respected campesino leader, father of ten children whose pregnant wife gave birth to their 11th child three months after Perez's assassination. He was shot seven times, his head bashed in, and arm broken. He died in my arms as we desperately carried his body to a nearby town in an attempt to save him. The anti-Sandinista forces told us they "executed" him because he was a leader in the education and health campaigns connected to the Sandinista government.

Mr. Perez is only one example of the many Christian leaders who have been singled out for brutal executions by the anti-Sandinista forces. Another example is Julio Lira, a teacher and Catechist who was brutally murdered in July 1982, and his body cut up and strewn along the river bank near his home.

The result of this terror campaign has been that the medical and education resources in our area have now been pulled out in order to assure the safety not only of the doctors and teachers, but also of the families with whom they live. This measure was taken after families were wiped out simply for having provided housing for teachers in their township.

Most recently, our parish was victim of an intense wave of terror by anti-Sandinista forces. From August 30 to September 3, 1983 a military task force of the F.D.N. swept through our parish and murdered 20 civilians, raped women and children, robbed poor peasants, burnt homes, and destroyed the few cooperatives that the community had struggled to build. The areas most affected were in four isolated townships.

The terror of this raid was most graphic in the attack on one of those townships. Here the anti-Sandinista forces who openly identified themselves by painting their letters, F.D.N. on the few huts they left unburned, mercilessly butchered ten civilians. This included Santos Pablo Diaz, whose head they chopped off and hung from the door of his home while they threw the rest of his body into the river. Nino Diaz Cano who was fifty years old, was beaten and then his heart cut out. They shot Rosa Perez after forcing her and other women to grovel in the mud like pigs. They did the same with children, including a ten year-old girl who was shot four times, and left for dead, but who miraculously survived and is now recovering in a Managua hospital.

These events were recounted to me by my fellow priest who went immediately into the area to search for survivors. Some of the details were also told to me directly by the survivors who witnessed the massacres and some who were wounded. One of those survivors told me directly that when the F.D.N. forces attacked his small, unprotected township and murdered his friends in cold blood, these anti-Sandinista forces then boasted publicly to the terrorized campesinos that the F.D.N. received their arms from "the U.S. Reagan administration."

This is just one more piece of evidence, Mr. President, of the kinds of activities in which the Contras are involved. Now we find that the CIA is involved in the mining. I do not see how anyone could label that kind of activity as anything but terrorism and still we find at least apparently some reluctance of this body to speak out on these issues of terrorism. These are instances involving the killing and the butchering of peasants and peasant leaders paid for by the American taxpayers' money. I believe, Mr. President, that that kind of affidavit, made by a member of the clergy, is a statement with a great deal of credibility.

Mr. President, I was reviewing earlier the three treaties which have been violated, and I had just mentioned the Rio Treaty and had reviewed the first article which provides that "the contracted parties formally condemn war and undertake in their international relations not to resort to the threat of the use of force in any matter inconsistent with the provisions in the Charter of the United Nation or of this treaty."

Now I am referring to the Rio Treaty.

Article II provides:

As a consequence of the principles set forth in the preceding article, the contracting parties undertake to submit every controversy which may arise between them to methods of peaceful settlements and to endeavor to settle any such controversy among themselves by means of procedures in force in the inter-American system before referring it to the General Assembly or the Security Council of the United Nations.

Mr. President, within that treaty there are procedures by which disputes are settled. The fact of the matter remains that even though we are a signatory to that particular treaty, we have not used those procedures in an attempt to resolve the disputes. Clearly, the actions or the activities which we support with the Contras we are finding increasingly fall within the definition of terrorist acts. Certainly, the kind of activities that I have just referred to fall within that definition.

It seems to me that the basic issue which we are addressing with these amendments are, one, the question of the mining, and, two, the issue and question about how we are going to be able to proceed in order that this issue be resolved in a nonforceful way. That would mean the International Court of Justice, in this case. But, again, with the action of the administration we see the attempt to really deny that World Court from the opportunity of any kind of ruling.

Mr. President, I will mention just on this issue of procedure, as we have mentioned earlier, as the Senator from Montana has pointed out, the two different provisions dealing with, one, the mining of the harbor, and two, the juridical issue which has been raised.

I believe the court is familiar with making a judgment on issues involving the sea. The most famous international case that I believed involved actually a blockade is the famous Corfu Channel case.

In any event, the following countries, Mr. President, or states accept the jurisdiction of the court. This list, which represents the situation as of January 1, 1983, includes states whose declarations accepting the compulsory jurisdiction of the permanent Court of International Justice have not lapsed or been withdrawn and are therefore applicable to the present court.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senator might yield to me without losing his right to the floor.

Mr. KENNEDY. I will be glad to yield to the majority leader with that understanding.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the majority leader is recognized.

Mr. BAKER. I thank the Chair and I thank the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. President, I have conferred with the minority leader and I am prepared to propound a unanimous consent for the attention of the Senators.

UNANIMOUS-CONSENT AGREEMENT

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that on tomorrow there be a 30-minute time limitation of debate equally divided in the usual form on amendment 2905, as modified and divided, following which there be recognition of the majority leader to move to table division 1, and if that division is tabled, that the majority leader be recognized to table division 2.

Mr. President, reserving on my own request, may I say this: It is the intention of the leadership to ask the Senate to go out if this request is agreed to. The effect of it would be as follows: When we resume consideration of the pending business, there will be 30 minutes of debate on the amendment. At the end of that 30 minutes the majority leader will be recognized under the order to table division 1. If it is tabled, then the majority leader, under this order, would automatically be recognized to move to table division 2.

That is the request I have just put.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, would I be correct in understanding that if the majority leader was not successful in tabling we would move to a vote on the amendment?

Mr. BAKER. No, Mr. President, that is not the effect. This deals with a time limitation on a tabling motion. As and when recognition was gained for the purpose of making a tabling motion, absent an arrangement of this sort there would be no time for debate. This applies only to a tabling motion. If it is not tabled, the amendment and the division would be open to further debate.

Mr. KENNEDY. I want to make it very clear that I am prepared to see a time agreement on the whole amendment. There were statements made here earlier about how this amendment is delaying the whole consideration of the Senate on the deficit, and that this is somehow a dilatory action by the Senator from Massachusetts.

The majority leader has propounded a time agreement which I would appear to certainly endorse, but I am very much surprised that if the motion of the majority leader is not successful that we could not proceed in a way which we do so often, and that is to set another half-hour for debate on the amendment itself and then move to final disposition of the amendment.

I want to make it very clear that I would not object to what the majority leader has proposed at this time, though I do feel that if the majority leader wants to at this time propose a consent agreement of a half-hour for debate on this particular amendment, evenly divided, so we can reach the substance of that amendment, I would certainly welcome it.

I am not interested in tying up the Senate on this issue. I do believe it is important, though, and I do believe the Members ought to have the right to vote on it.

If I hear correctly, I fear we might go into some form of extended discussion if the proposal of the majority leader is not successful. I do not minimize the persuasiveness of the majority leader, being able to persuade individuals to support a tabling motion. But I would have thought that a proposal like this would have included a short or reasonable time limit subsequent to that, if it fails. I would not object, but I would hope that that would have been included.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

The text of the agreement follows:

Ordered, That on Tuesday, April 10, 1984, when the Senate resumes consideration of the pending business, H.R. 2163 (Order No. 571), an act to amend the Federal Boat Safety Act of 1971, and for other purposes, there be 30 minutes debate on amendment No. 2905, to be equally divided and controlled by the mover of such and the manager of the bill. Ordered further, That upon the disposition of that time, the Majority Leader be recognized to move to table division 1: Provided, That if division 1 is tabled, the Majority Leader be recognized to move to table division 2: Provided further, That if the motion to table division 1 is not agreed to, the above agreement is nugatory. (April 9, 1984)

ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be a period for the transaction of routine morning business to extend not later than 8 p.m. in which Senators may speak.

ESTHER DOUGHTY LUCKHARDT—A GREAT WISCONSIN LEGISLATOR

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, Friday was the last day for State Representative Esther Doughty Luckhardt, a 22-year veteran of the Wisconsin State Legislature, to serve in her legislative capacity.

I should like to take this opportunity to pay tribute to Esther and to thank her for 22 years of unselfish public service.

When she was first elected in 1962, Mrs. Luckhardt was the only woman in the Wisconsin Legislature. She was the ninth woman to serve as a lawmaker in our State since women obtained the right to vote. Upon retirement, she will have served longer than any other woman in the Wisconsin Legislature.

Things have certainly changed for women in politics. Esther said recently that when she first ran for office, she had three children and almost had to hide them. Her youngest daughter, Pat, traveled around the district with her, playing paper dolls in the back seat of the car.

Esther Luckhardt was truly ahead of her time. In 1969, she championed legislation to allow a woman to retain her surname upon marriage. But, the Governor, feeling the legislation would cause too many problems with credit, vetoed the bill.

Those of us who served with Esther in the Wisconsin Legislature will always remember her for her tireless fight to hold down the drive to increase taxes and spending. Throughout her career, Esther maintained absolute independence and continued to move against the tide in her desire to insure a bright future for the State of Wisconsin. She once said:

When I decided to run for the legislature in 1962, it was to preserve my children's heritage. I wanted to help make and keep Wisconsin a place where my children could thrive and prosper without a heavy burden of taxation.

Mrs. Luckhardt spent 22 years saying "no!"—no to State tax hikes, not to more State spending, and especially no to bonding. As a member of the State building commission, she was tenacious in her belief that Wisconsin should not mortgage the future of our children.

A Republican colleague said of Esther, "She's been our iron woman. Just unbendable. When it came to spending, you really had to justify it."

Things will not be the same in the Wisconsin Legislature without Esther Luckhardt. Her feisty approach to good government will long be remembered by those with whom she served.

Mr. President, as a friend and colleague of Esther's I am pleased to share with my fellow Senators today just a small portion of a long and dedicated career of a truly wonderful woman.

Esther has been a great representative of the people—"her people"—as she calls them. Knowing Esther, I am sure this is not the end of her career—more like a change of direction. I wish her health and happiness in whatever arena she choose to carry her flag.

"Whereas, Agricultural pests represent a serious threat to California's agriculture industry and the state's economy; and

"Whereas, Pest exclusion is an essential segment of pest management; and

"Whereas, Pest eradication programs are expensive; and

"Whereas, Recent agricultural pest outbreaks and crises warrant increased pest exclusion and management efforts; now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Assembly and the Senate of the State of California, jointly, That the United States Department of Agriculture (U.S.D.A.) increase its agricultural pest inspection activities at California's Mexican border and at California's international points of entry; and be it further

"Whereas, There is a high possiblity that pests and diseases harmful to California's agriculture, forests, and urban areas may be transmitted by organisms carried in food or meat or other articles brought in by these visitors; and

"Whereas, The introduction of foreign pests and diseases could severely damage California's $14 billion agricultural industry, and the state's recreational and urban areas; and

"Whereas, The increased travel to California will make dramatic demands upon resources needed to enforce quarantine requirements at all points of entry into California; and

"Whereas, The need for increased resources is especially critical at seaports and airports; and

"Whereas, Special precautions must be taken to prevent introductions of pests and diseases into California and the United States; now, therefore, be it

"Whereas, the Farmers Home Administration was created to assist low-income rural residents towards purchasing homes; and

"Whereas, the FMHA has in Pennsylvania and in other states implemented foreclosure practices that appear to be more restrictive than local lending institutions; and

"Whereas, this policy has resulted in mortgage foreclosuers of homeowners who are disabled, unemployed or underemployed through no fault of their own and in many instances these homeowners are continuing to make payments towards principal and/or interest; and

"Whereas, this practice appears to be in contradiction to the original intent of the FMHA; therefore be it

"Resolved, That the House of Representatives memorialize the United States Congress to review the current foreclosure practice of the Farmers Home Mortgage Administration; and be it further

"Resolved, That copies of this resolution be transmitted to the presiding officers of each house of Congress and to each member of Congress from Pennsylvania."

POM-598. A resolution adopted by the Legislature of the Territory of Guam; to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

"RESOLUTION No. 397

"Be it resolved by the Legislature of the Territory of Guam:

"Whereas, the patriarch of the Artero family of Guam, Don Pascual Artero Y Saez acquired in the early part of this century extensive property in northern Guam; and

"Whereas, on this over 2000 hectares of land Don Pascual Artero Y Saez established a lumber mill and had a cattle ranch of thousands of heads of cattle and raised over a thousand hogs; and

"Whereas, shortly after World War II, the federal government by authority of Acts of Congress approved August 2, 1946 (Public Law 594, 79th Congress) and May 10, 1948 (Public Law 419, 80th Congress) condemned, inter alia, ninety percent (90%) of the Artero property in furtherance of the Base Development Program of the United States of America in Guam; and

"Whereas, there is in existence a United States Executive Order No. 10178 issued circa November 1950 which exempts the Artero property from condemnation by the United States Government; and

"Whereas, the condemned Artero property comprised of 1848 hectares (the Upi property), which is now Andersen Air Force Base and 305 hectares, (the Toguac property), which is now the site of the Naval Communications Master Station; and

"Whereas, the remaining Artero property (beach property known as Urunao, Lot No. 10080) is located adjacent to Northwest Field (inactive) and access to Urunao from the nearest public highway is through land claimed by the federal government; and

"Whereas, the Potts Junction Road which provides access to the Artero property in Urunao Beach is available for use by the Artero family on a restricted basis; and

"Whereas, in the early 1970's Seibu Leisure Industrial (Guam) Inc.'s, offer to build a $50 Million plus hotel and resort complex was thwarted because the U.S. Military claims jurisdiction over the road and claims that such construction and tourist development would jeopardize base security at Andersen Air Force Base and the Naval Communications Master Station; and

"Whereas, the easement requested is at the base of a 200 feet cliff that is relatively flat and at one time granted as access to the Aguero and Flores families; and

"Whereas, the Seventeenth Guam Legislature strongly believes that adequate security for Andersen Air Force Base and Naval Communication Master Station and the economic development of the Artero property and ultimately, of the territory are not mutually exclusive; and

"Whereas, the solution of the existing problem would promote development of private property, increase the territory's tax base and, increase employment and would be in consonance with the economic policy of the Administration; and

"Whereas, the Assistant Secretary of Territorial and International Affairs, Department of Interior, Richard Montoya, has announced a territorial policy of economic diversification including improvement of Guam's tourist industry; and

"Whereas, it would also reduce the territory's dependence over federal support; now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, That the Seventeenth Guam Legislature respectfully requests the President of the United States and the United States Congress to cause appropriate action to be taken to allow unrestricted public use of the Potts Junction road to Ritidian Point, a paved road with restricted access, so as to open up the development of Urunao Beach as a hotel and resort complex; and be it further

"Resolved, That the United States Government provide an alternative to the Artero, Aguero and Flores families for the property that has been inversely condemned by closing the access road to their property by paying just compensation for the inverse condemnation from the time of taking; and be it further

"Resolved, That the territorial policy of the U.S. Department of Interior, that is, economic development of Guam's private sector, be furthered by the removal of the restriction; and be it further

"Resolved, That the Speaker certify to and the Legislative Secretary attest the adoption thereof and that copies of the same be thereafter transmitted to Ronald Reagan, President of the United States; to George Bush, President of the Senate; to the Speaker of the United States House of Representatives, Thomas P. O'Neil; to the Chairman, Committee on Energy and Natural Resources, James A. McClure; to the Chairman, House Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs, Morris Udall; to the Secretary of the Interior; to the Secretary of Defense; to the Secretary of the Air Force; to the Secretary of the Navy; to the Chairman of the House of Representatives Committee on Armed Services; to the Chairman of the Senate Committee on Armed Services; to the Chairman, Subcommittee on Military Construction, Committee on Armed Services; to the United Nations Special Committee on Decolonization; to Congress Antonio B. Won Pat; and to the Governor of Guam."

"SENATE RESOLUTION 1984-179

"Whereas, The Nuclear Waste Policy Act of 1982 provides for state participation in the planning and development of a high-level radioactive waste repository; and

"Whereas, The Secretary of the United States Department of Energy shall consult and cooperate with the state in an effort to resolve the concerns of such state regarding the public health and safety, environmental, and economic impacts which may result from the location of a high-level radioactive waste repository in the state; and

"Whereas, In order for the state to adequately express its concerns with respect to repository planning and development, it must have access to consultants who are free of any conflict of interest; and

"Whereas, There are a limited number of qualified consultants available for research in the areas pertinent to repository planning and development; and

"Whereas, The hiring of a large number of consultants by the federal government depletes the number of consultants available to the state; and

"Whereas, The state of Washington contracted with the consulting firm of Golder and Associates which resulted in a critical report of the federal government's research and study of the Hanford basalts; and

"Whereas, Following the criticism by Golder and Associates the federal government hired the firm;

"Now, therefore, be it resolved, By the Senate of the state of Washington, That the federal government should refrain from monopolizing the field of available consultants; and

"Be it further resolved, That copies of this resolution be forwarded to the President of the United States, the Secretary of the United States Department of Energy, the President of the United States Senate, the Speaker of the United States House of Representatives, and to the members of the Congressional delegation from Washington State."

POM-600. A resolution adopted by the House of Representatives of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania; to the Committee on Environment and Public Works.

"Whereas, Existing Federal law prohibits the use of Federal highway funds by states for the construction of toll roads and bridges; and

"Whereas, Pennsylvania is contemplating the construction of major highways and bridges as toll roads and bridges; and

"Whereas, The utilization of Federal funds would greatly aid this endeavor to the betterment of travel conditions for all citizens of the United States and the improvement of the national economy and the economy of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania; therefore be it

"Resolved, That the House of Representatives of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania memorialize the Congress of the United States to enact legislation which would permit the utilization of Federal highway fund money for the construction of toll roads and bridges; and be it further

"Resolved, That copies of this resolution be transmitted to the presiding officers of each house of Congress and to each member of Congress from Pennsylvania."

POM-601. A joint resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of Wyoming; to the Committee on Environment and Public Works.

"ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION No. 1, SENATE

"Whereas, the Army Corps of Engineers and the United States Environmental Protection Agency have claimed that Section 404 of the Clean Water Act allows these federal agencies to determine how much water may be diverted by a water right to permittee from streams and rivers in the State of Wyoming;

"Whereas, Section 101(g) of the Clean Water Act states that the Act shall not supercede, abrogate or impair the water allocation systems and water rights created under state law;

"Whereas, the purposes of the Clean Water Act, and in particular Section 404, is to reduce pollution from dredge and fill activities;

"Whereas, the United States Fish and Wildlife Service is developing plans for the recovery of various species of endangered fish and wildlife that do not consider the effects of state water laws, rights and administration;

"Whereas, the effects of these plans could be to limit and restrict the future use of private water rights, to disregard the priority of private water rights approved under state law and to impose depletion taxes and user fees that are burdensome and unfair;

"Whereas, The United States Congress has ratified and approved various interstate compacts which apportion the water between Wyoming and other states;

"Whereas, the states have relied on these compacts and laws of the United States in creating rights to present and future uses of water within the boundaries of Wyoming and the other signatory states; and

"Whereas, the use of the Clean Water Act and the Endangered Species Act as implemented by the Corps of Engineers, the Environmental Protection Agency, and the United States Fish and Wildlife Service have in effect denied the State of Wyoming the right to develop its water as set forth in various interstate river compacts.

"Now, therefore, be it resolved by the Legislature of the State of Wyoming, That the Congress of the United States amend the Clean Water Act to clearly provide in Section 404 that no determination by the Corps of Engineers or the Environmental Protection Agency under Section 404 be used to prevent or limit the diversion, storage, or beneficial use of water that is authorized by various interstate river compacts as approved by the signatory states and by the United States Congress;

"It is further resolved, That the Congress amend the Endangered Species Act to assure full protection of state water rights and of water allocated or decreed to a state from being diminished or abrogated by conflicts with the Endangered Species Act;

"It is further resolved, That Congress is requested to reaffirm the authority and primacy of state law to regulate, administer and allocate the waters of the respective states; and

"It is further resolved, That copies of this resolution be transmitted by the Secretary of State to the presiding officers of each House of Congress of the United States and to each Senator and Representative in the Congress of the United States."

"Whereas, Unemployment within Pennsylvania has reached massive levels and specifically within locations where construction projects are scheduled; therefore be it

"Resolved, That the House of Representatives memorialize each Senator and Representative from Pennsylvania in the Congress of the United States and the Secretary of the Department of Transportation of the United States to place highest priority upon utilizing Federal highway funds to employ unemployed Pennsylvania residents who live in project areas; and be it further

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the United States Department of Transportation prepare a plan which requires private contractors to employ as much as 20% of the construction work force from among Pennsylvania residents residing within a 50-mile radius of the project area and to give additional preference to selecting unemployed Pennsylvania residents; and be it further

"Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be forwarded to each member of Congress from Pennsylvania and to the Secretary of the United States Department of Transportation."

STATEMENTS ON INTRODUCED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS

By Mr. STEVENS:

S. 2543. A bill for the relief of Leroy W. Shebal of North Pole, Alaska; to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

RELIEF OF LEROY W. SHEBAL

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, this bill would direct the Secretary of the Interior to sell a parcel of land within the White Mountains National Recreational Area to Leroy Shebal of North Pole, Alaska.

Leroy filed on this land under the Small Tract Act in 1958. He was given a lease on the land in 1960. Five years later, the Bureau of Land Management offered to sell the land to Leory for $650. Leroy was unable to accept the offer at that time because of an illness in his family. He was given assurances that the offer to sell would remain open until his financial situation improved.

In September 1971, Leroy accepted the BLM's offer to sell the land. The BLM failed to process Leroy's acceptance in a timely fashion As a result, before the BLM took any action to reclassify the land and sell it to Leroy, a public land order prohibiting land sales in the Beaver Creek area was promulgated. A year and half later after he had written to BLM, Leroy received a letter from the agency rejecting his acceptance.

The public land order that prevented the BLM from selling the Beaver Creek parcel is no longer in effect. The Alaska National Interest Lands Conservation Act of 1980, however, included Beaver Creek in the National Wild and Scenic Rivers System. The Wild and Scenic Rivers Act prohibits the sale of any land within the System.

Mr. President, for more than two decades, Leroy Shebal has operated an environmentally sound guiding operation on Beaver Creek. He has made substantial improvements to the property he leased from the Federal Government in reliance on the assurances of the Bureau of Land Management that he would eventually be able to purchase the property. He has done eveything possible to meet the terms of the BLM's offer of sale. It would be a grave injustice if Congress did not act to authorize the sale of the Beaver Creek property to him.

By Mr. ABDNOR (for himself and Mr. DECONCINI):

S. 2544. A bill to amend section 3056 of title 18, United States Code, to update the authorities of the U.S. Secret Service, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Finance.

UPDATING THE AUTHORITIES OF THE SECRET SERVICE

Mr. ABDNOR. Mr. President, I am today introducing a bill which would repeal section 3056, title 18, United States Code, as it is presently constituted and replace it with a new, more easily referenced section for purposes of clarity; remove the gender specific terminology relating to protection of the President and others by the Secret Service; and modify the criminal investigative jurisdiction of the Service to keep pace with new technology.

Since the original codification of section 3056 over 30 years ago, it has been modified on numerous occasions through insertion of additional language and the passage of supplementary uncodified provisions. Consequently, section 3056 is one, 66-line, 3-sentence section in the United States Code.

This change is a re-creation of the current section, solely to provide a new, more easily referenced style. It in no way modifies current protective duties of the Secret Service. It for the first time provides a "listing" of Secret Service protectees in one easily identifiable portion of the Code.

The final part of the bill modifies the criminal investigation jurisidiction of the Secret Service in order to assure that it keeps pace with current criminal activity. The Secret Service has traditionally investigated all financial crimes affecting the Treasury. In the past these violations involved currency, coins, and securities. This is no longer the only threat to the Treasury.

Electronic fund transfer mechanisms, for instance, are well on the way to becoming the primary conduit for the payment of Government obligations, replacing the traditional Treasury check. In order to meet the challenge of criminal activity in this area, the Treasury Department has taken the administrative action necessary to be certain that the Secret Service remains engaged in protecting the assets of the United States. Due to the somewhat obscure nature of the Secret Service's authorizing legislation in this area, however, it is not entirely clear that Congress has authorized that the necessary criminal investigations be performed by that agency. This proposal would make absolutely clear the fact that the Secret Service is authorized to conduct criminal investigations of, make arrests in, and present for prosecutorial consideration, cases relating to electronic fund transfer frauds.

This proposal would also authorize the Secret Service to conduct investigations in the areas of credit and debit card fraud and the use, manufacture, or dealing in false identification documents. While on first impression, it might seem that these would be totally new areas of activity for the Secret Service, a more careful analysis reveals that this is not the case. The history of Secret Service investigations demonstrates, not surprisingly, that individuals engaging in crimes relating to Government obligations and securities routinely require false identification documents to complete their misdeeds. Further, and again not surprisingly, their criminal activity extends into alined areas of financial crime such as credit and debit card fraud.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that my statement and the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2544

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That (a) section 3056 of title 18, United States Code, is amended to read as follows:

(b) The table of contents of chapter 203 of title 18, United States Code, is amended by striking out the item relating to section 3056 and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

By Mr. HELMS:

S. 2545. A bill to amend the National School Lunch Act and the Child Nutrition Act of 1966 to reform and extend certain nutrition programs, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry.

NUTRITION PROGRAMS REFORM ACT

● Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, I am today introducing the Nutrition Programs Reform Act, consistent with the congressional mandate to insure that Federal tax dollars are directed to those in greatest need.

Numerous changes are incorporated with respect to the summer food service program. This program, which currently operates at an annual cost of $110 million—for 4 months during the summer—is insufficiently targeted toward poor children. Currently, any child presenting himself to a summer food service program must be served a meal. There is no verification of need.

Mr. President, the program has been plagued with reported abuses. Reforms enacted in the Omnibus Budget Reconciliation Act of 1981 (Public Law 97-35) have fallen short of expectations.

Changes recommended in the special supplemental food program for women, infants, and children (WIC) are also designed to insure that the structure of the existing program is increasingly focused on needs of mothers and infants from poor families. Additionally, detailed Federal requirements prescribed in the law are reduced to provide greater flexibility to the States in administering the program. Funding for administrative expenses is reduced from 20 to 15 percent of overall State costs. This will insure that a greater percentage of funds is spent on direct assistance to recipients, rather than on administrative functions.

The separate program providing Federal funding for State administrative expenses for the various child nutrition programs is eliminated. The Federal Government already provides substantial funding for these programs through generous reimbursement rates. Reducing the Federal support for administrative expenses will encourage States to undertake greater efficiencies in their administration of these programs or to invest State tax dollars in these administrative expenses.

SUMMER FOOD SERVICE PROGRAM

Mr. President, the summer food service program—often referred to as the summer feeding or summer food program—operates during the months of May through September to provide meals and a snack to children age 18 and under in certain areas of the United States. It also operates in Puerto Rico, the Virgin Islands, and Guam.

The program may operate in geographical areas where one-half or more of the children are eligible for free or reduced-price lunches, that is, have family incomes at or below 185 percent of poverty, or $18,315 for a family of four, effective July 1, 1983 through June 30, 1984. Camps are also eligible.

Meals are served free to all participants, and are limited to two meals a day—lunch and either breakfast or a snack.

At the present time, the summer food service program operates as an entitlement program. The Federal Government currently reimburses the site a minimum of $146.5 per meal for any child, regardless of household income, who comes to an eligible summer food site. The sites themselves must be accepted into the program if they meet federally established criteria.

The number of Federal programs operating as entitlement programs has grown enormously in the past decade. This has greatly contributed to the spiraling rate of Federal spending. The first, fundamental reform included for the summer food program is that the program's entitlement nature is changed. Rather, the program would be converted to an authorization program, in which the program's operational level would be limited to the amount appropriated.

There is no rationale for permitting this program to operate; in effect, as an entitlement. Congressional oversight will be increased by conversion to a regular appropriated program, permitting the Appropriations Committees to review the program and to recommend funding levels they deem appropriate.

Indeed, the folly of the entitlement nature can be seen from the experience from 1981. The Congressional Budget Office expected savings from the 1981 program changes to be $85 million, from projected expenditures of $142 million, resulting in an approximately annual cost of $57 million in fiscal year 1982. However, in actuality, the program reductions were much more modest—$53 million—leaving the annual cost at $89 million, $32 million more than had been anticipated. Because of the entitlement nature of the program, little could be done, especially expeditiously, to modify—that is, lower—the program's cost in conformity with the intent of the 1981 reconciliation legislation.

The second fundamental shift in the program that needs to be made is the imposition of a "means test" to insure that Federal expenditures are targeted to the poor. In many areas of the country, nonpoor children live in close proximity to summer food programs, although the programs themselves are supposed to be located in poor areas. At the present time there is no safeguard to insure that the individuals served by the program are truly poor. Under the bill, an individual means test will replace the existing geographical area designation for the operation of the summer food service program.

The summer food service program is one of only two food and nutrition programs which does not have an income-based means test for individual participants. I introduced legislation last fall, S. 1994, to institute a means test for the only other program, the day care home component of the child care food program.

One of the most important developments in child nutrition legislation over the past decade has been to improve the targeting of benefits to poor children. In fiscal year 1970, about 22 percent of all child nutrition program expenditures were provided for programs that had a Federal income test. By 1980, this proportion had grown to approximately 58.3 percent of total child nutrition expenditures. Last year, the proportion of expenditures provided for income-tested programs was about 73 percent.

The implementation of an income-based means test in the summer program—as well as that recommended in S. 1994 for the day care portion of the child care food program—will continue this trend.

Under the guidelines provided in this legislation, children eligible for free lunches under the National School Lunch Act would continue to be eligible for receipt of free meals in the summer food service program. Currently, the eligibility for free lunches is 130 percent of the OMB income poverty guidelines. Those guidelines, as compared with 100 percent of poverty, are shown in the following table:

INCOME ELIGIBILITY STANDARDS FOR FREE AND REDUCED-PRICED LUNCHES IN THE SCHOOL LUNCH PROGRAM [1]

[July 1, 1983—June 30, 1984]

Household size	130 percent (free)		185 percent (reduced price)		100 percent
	Month	Year	Month	Year	Month	Year
1	$527	$6,318	$4,750	$8,991	$405	$4,860
2	709	8,502	1,009	12,099	545	6,540
3	891	10,586	1,268	15,207	685	8,220

Each additional	+182	+2,184	+259	+3,108	+140	+1,680

[1] The eligibility standards that exist for the lunch program also apply with regard to the school breakfast program and to child care centers participating in the child care food program.

Approximately 43 percent of the children receiving federally subsidized school lunches receive them free of charge. Thus, this would be the eligible group of children who could receive free summer meals. Younger children who receive free lunches in child care centers, rather than schools, also would be eligible for free summer meals.

Also, 17 States that currently request the Federal Government to operate the summer food service program in their States would be required to assume State administration of the program. Effective with the summer of 1985, the Federal Government would no longer administer the program. If States really believe that this program is worthwhile, they should be willing to assume the responsibility for its operation. They will no longer be able to turn over such duties to the Federal Government.

The elimination of the direct Federal administration of the summer program has been recommended in the past by the Inspector General of the Department of Agriculture. He has noted that USDA does not have the staff to operate the summer program in all of the States where now required to do so and to deal with literally thousands of local summer food sponsors. Because of the present situation, the Department has been compelled to reduce essential efforts to monitor and enforce compliance with program rules and to reduce overpayment and waste.

The Omnibus Reconciliation Act of 1981 eliminated the ability of States to foist off management of all food and nutrition programs to the Federal Government. Only States that were not operating the programs on October 1, 1980, could continue to require the Federal Government to undertake such administrative responsibility. However, those States that were grandfathered in by the 1980 date still maintain the ability to require the Federal Government to assume responsibility for operating the program.

States appear particularly unwilling to assume operation of the summer food service program. Currently, 17 States do not operate the program, but rather require Federal administration. This appears to indicate that as many as a third of the States question the very worth of the program.

Under the bill, the summer food service program would be permitted to operate only in schools and summer camps. Both the General Accounting Office and the Office of Inspector General have noted that schools are most capable of handling the processing of summer lunches. School cafeterias are obviously equipped to handle regular meal preparation and can be readily used in the summer. Indeed, over 40 percent of all meals currently served in the summer program are served in schools. However, this legislation will require that all meals be served through schools and eligible camps.

The General Accounting Office has noted in the past that many sites, particularly nonschool sites, had inadequate food service and food storage facilities. Sanitation is obviously a concern in such situations. Schools have acceptable facilities because of their use in the school lunch program. Additionally, camps generally have comparable cafeteria facilities.

Meals prepared will be reimbursed by the Federal Government at the same cash rate as if provided for free meals in the school lunch program, currently $120.25 or $122.25 in certain schools. Because participation would be limited primarily to schools, there will no longer be the need for the high administrative payments which are currently in place to compensate for the higher costs of preparing meals and transporting them to nonfood service locations.

Lastly, the program will be restricted to serving only lunches. While the vast majority of meals served in the current program—approximately 77 percent—are for lunch, some summer program sites also service either breakfast—13 percent—or a snack—10 percent. In order to provide better nutrition, the program's operation will be limited to the provision of lunches, which will meet the nutritional criteria prescribed by the Secretary.

The combined effects of this retargeting of benefits should be to reduce the expense of the program considerably, while insuring that the most needy children are served.

At the same time, these reforms should also reduce the overall program costs, possibly by as much as half. I am recommending a reauthorization level of $60 million for fiscal year 1985, to insure that the program has sufficient flexibility to operate with these changes.

SPECIAL SUPPLEMENTAL FOOD PROGRAM FOR WOMEN, INFANTS, AND CHILDREN

With regard to the WIC program, the primary purpose of the recommended changes is to provide better targeting of Federal dollars to those recipients most in need. Indeed, there is a need to know more about those who are already participating in the program. While the total number of participants is known, we know very little about whether the program is serving primarily the poorest potential recipients and those at greatest nutritional risk. Inasmuch as eligibility extends to 185 percent of poverty, almost $18,315 for a family of four, it is important, in my view, that primary concern should be given to those in greatest need, such as those below 100 percent of poverty and those at greatest nutritional risk.

Additionally, it is important that the program concentrate on serving low-income pregnant women, breastfeeding women, and infants, the highest priority groups under the current regulations. The General Accounting Office has recently conducted a thorough review of existing studies on the WIC program, entitled "WIC Evaluations Provide Some Favorable but No Conclusive Evidence on the Effects Expected for the Special Supplemental Program for Women, Infants, and Children," January 30, 1984. While most of the evidence regarding the effectiveness of the program is inconclusive at best, it seems reasonable that whatever beneficial impact may occur from program participation is most likely to occur among these highest risk, and thus highest priority, participants.

However, the current funding formula rewards States that have high numbers of participants, regardless of their relative need. For instance, the food packages for pregnant and breastfeeding women, two of the highest priority groups, are the most expensive. Thus, less people, although of higher priority, can be served for a given amount of money than if, say, older children are served by the program; food packages for such children are less expensive. States have responded to the present allocation system by concentrating on numbers of recipients, rather than the degree of need. It is not at all unusual, for instance, to have situations in which less than half of a State's caseload is in the highest priority category.

Given the present budget situation, it is imperative that States target available dollars to those most in need. Therefore, one of the fundamental changes which is recommended is that the Secretary allocate half of the WIC appropriation based on the percentage of each State's recipients who are at greatest need. This will encourage States to target assistance based on actual need rather then simply trying to amass large caseloads, often comprised of individuals with less nutritional priority.

Other aspects of the legislation are also formulated in such a way as to provide maximum use of Federal tax dollars to benefit needy recipients. Administrative costs can be, and should be reduced, in combination with a reasonable reduction in unnecessary Federal requirements currently required by existing law and regulations. The bill provides for much greater flexibility in the administration of the program while reducing the allowable administrative expenses from the present level of 20 percent to 15 percent.

It should be noted that 15 percent for administrative costs is the same percentage that is permitted in a somewhat similar program, the commodity supplemental food program, in which actual commodities are furnished to recipients. Additionally, the 15-percent figure is a reasonable midpoint between the present level of 20 percent and the original—pre-1975—level of 10 percent which had been permitted. The administration has announced its intention to recommend an 18-percent figure which while an improvement, is still somewhat too high in my judgment.

Under the bill, the Secretary would be given the authority to establish minimum sizes for State agencies. This has become necessary because of the proliferation of Indian agencies permitted to participate. While I have no difficulty in permitting separate Indian administrative units where it is cost effective to do so, clearly it is not cost effective in a number of current situations. Several of the present Indian agencies spend over half of their entire WIC budget in administrative costs. The establishment of minimum size agencies will not affect those larger Indian agencies where a separate entity may be cost effective and provides an agreeable arrangement with both the Indian tribe and the State agency. However, in the case of smaller Indian agencies, it would be more efficient and cost effective if those agencies were combined with the predominant State agency.

Similarly, the present situation in which the WIC program operates alongside the commodity supplemental food program in several cities is not cost effective. The duplicate administrative structures for the two programs simply increase the administrative costs associated with the programs without improving service to needy recipients. The proposed legislation would eliminate this overlap in structure and prompt areas to select one program or the other to operate in one geographic area.

Because the Department of Agriculture has contracted for a major evaluation of the WIC program, the bill would extend the program for 1 year. This will enable the Congress to reevaluate the existing program in light of the findings of that study, which is expected to be completed later this calendar year.

For this reason, the bill does not change fundamental aspects of the program, but rather are aims at administrative simplification, a reduction of administrative expenses, and improved targeting of benefits.

SECTION 32 COMMODITY DONATIONS

The legislation continues for another year the provision of current law which requires the use of certain agricultural support funds—section 32 funds—to purchase commodities for most child nutrition programs and for elderly nutrition programs. The commodities so purchased by the U.S. Department of Agriculture are those needed to meet the annually programed level of commodity assistance mandated for these programs by other provisions of law. For instance, currently 11.5 cents per meal is provided in commodities for each school lunch.

The commodity distribution program requires the use of section 32 funds to finance the purchase of most of the commodities mandated for these programs. Section 32 of the act of August 24, 1935, sets aside an amount equivalent to 30 percent of gross customs receipts for, among other things, removal of agricultural surpluses, increased domestic food consumption, and food assistance to low-income populations.

Generally, the majority of mandated commodities for child nutrition programs are purchased with section 32 funds. In fiscal year 1983, $365.4 million of the total 460 million dollars' worth of commmodity assistance mandated for child nutrition programs was financed with section 32 funds. The remaining commodities were purchased with child nutrition program account funds. For fiscal year 1984, $365.4 million in section 32 funds are again expected to be used to meet the commodity assistance mandate for child nutrition programs.

These commodities should not be confused with bonus commodities that are also provided to these child nutrition programs and for other purposes if available and requested. These bonus commodities are agricultural products that are acquired by the Department of Agriculture as a result of unexpected surpluses, or as is the case for dairy products, because of large Commodity Credit Corporation holdings. The primary bonus commodities provided in recent years have been dairy commodities such as cheese and butter.

STATE ADMINISTRATIVE EXPENSES

The legislation terminates any further Federal payments for State administrative expenses in connection with most child nutrition programs. States operated the school lunch program for 20 years, until 1966, without such funding, and could be expected to do so again. While this funding may have been helpful in establishing the programs which are relatively new—school breakfast and child care food—the need for continuing such funding is questionable. The Federal Government already provides extremely generous benefits in the form of Federal reimbursement rates for the breakfast, lunch, and child care food programs.

States have not contributed much in State funds to these programs. Indeed, because of the continued Federal support, there has been little incentive for the development of improved administrative structures within the States. The elimination of this funding should provide incentives for the States to improve their administration, or to bear the financial burden for their existing administrative expenses.

NUTRITION EDUCATION AND TRAINING

The legislation also terminates the nutrition education and training program (NET). The original purpose of this program was to provide seed money for the States to begin or augment existing nutrition education programs. In the years since the program was initiated in 1977, these programs have become well established. It is now appropriate that the States should take over funding of this program and decide the appropriate State commitment for NET program operations.

31-059 O-87-37 (Pt. 6)

It should also be noted that the program primarily provides staffing at the State level for nutrition education programs, with a minimum of actual curriculum development. In some cases, it appears that States have simply substituted federally funded positions for those that were previously State funded.

STATE OPTION BLOCK GRANTS FOR CHILD NUTRITION

While this legislation was being developed, the President's Task Force on Food Assistance made its recommendations which were presented to the President on January 10. The most significant recommendation was that all food and nutrition programs should be incorporated into a State option block grant.

Even prior to the task force recommendation, I wrote—in December—to each State WIC director seeking counsel on the possibility of permitting a State option block grant for the WIC program, and especially about the possibility of consolidation with the material and child health block grant currently operated through the Department of Health and Human Services.

In light of the task force recommendations, I am now refining that proposal, and plan to introduce a State option block grant for the WIC and summer food service programs, both of which currently expire at the end of fiscal year 1984, and for the other child nutrition program—school lunch, school breakfast, and the child care food program. I have already introduced legislation, similar to that which the task force recommended, for the food stamp program, S. 1279, the Food Stamp Optional Block Grant Act.

I am convinced that the suggestion of the task force is a positive one that can improve the Federal Government's commitment to assisting low-income families with food assistance. For those States that wish to continue with the existing Federal programs, the reforms contained in this legislation should improve the administration of the programs, the taxpayers' confidence in them, and the service to those low-income families who are truly in need of federally sponsored assistance.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill and a summary of its provisions be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TITLE V—EFFECTIVE DATE

EFFECTIVE DATE

SEC. 501. The amendments made by this Act shall become effective on October 1, 1984.

SUMMARY OF NUTRITION PROGRAMS REFORM ACT

SUMMER FOOD SERVICE PROGRAM

Schools and camps.—Restricts eligibility for participation as a summer food service site to schools and camps, thereby eliminating government agency sites. (Sec. 101.)

Outreach.—Eliminates the requirements for the Secretary of Agriculture and States to undertake outreach activities to encourage participation in the summer food service program.

Income eligibility.—Establishes income eligibility for participation of children in the summer food service program. Children qualifying for free school lunches (household income less than 130 percent of poverty) would be eligible to receive meals. Children from higher income families would no longer be eligible. Current eligibility is based on the location of the summer food site which is supposed to be in an area in which over half the children are eligible for free or reduced price lunches. The new standard permits greater targeting to the actual needs and eligibility of individual children. (Sec. 103.)

Lunch only.—Reduces meals which can be served by summer food service sites to lunch only, rather than lunch and either breakfast or a snack. (Sec. 104.)

Reimbursement rates.—Establishes summer food service reimbursement rates at the same level as those provided in the school lunch program for free lunches. Eliminates higher, administrative funding provided for some meals under the current system. (Sec. 104.)

Funding.—Changes the program from an entitlement nature to an authorization subject to appropriations. The authorization level is established at $60 million for fiscal year 1985. (Sec. 105 and 106.)

Elimination of Federal administration.—Eliminates the existing requirement that the Federal Government operate the summer food service program directly in jurisdictions (currently 17 states) that have chosen not to do so through State administration. (Sec. 107.)

SPECIAL SUPPLEMENTAL FOOD PROGRAM FOR WOMEN, INFANTS, AND CHILDREN

Outreach.—Eliminates mandatory outreach as a requirement for State and local WIC agencies and as an allowable administrative expense. (Sec. 201.)

Start-up costs.—Eliminates "start-up costs" from allowable administrative expenses. (Sec. 201.)

Medical equipment.—Deletes references to specific pieces of medical equipment—"centrifuges, measuring boards, spectrophotometer, and scales"—and substitutes the general description "medical equipment" for certifying participation. This would allow for the introduction of new equipment and more flexibility by competent professional authorities in certifying persons for participation in the program. (Sec. 201.)

Children participating in CCFP.—Limits children (above age one and below age five) that may participate to those that are not receiving meals under the child care food program. Children participating in the child care food program may receive up to two meals and a snack daily. Eliminating from eligibility for WIC benefits those who already have access to another food program would permit greater targeting of benefits to those with higher nutritional risk priority, pregnant women and infants. (Sec. 202.)

Cultural eating patterns.—Eliminates references to cultural eating patterns as a factor which competent health professional authorities must consider in prescribing supplemental foods or that it to be taken into consideration in nutrition education. In order to address nutritional needs, only medical and nutrition conditions (already in the statute) should be taken into consideration. (Sec. 203 and 217.)

Minimum number of participants.—Permits the Secretary of Agriculture to specify that State agencies must serve a minimum number of participants. This would permit the Secretary to disallow separate State agencies below a certain size since some small State agencies have very high administrative costs per participant—some as much as five times the average national cost. It would be more cost effective and efficient if a State agency below a prescribed size could be absorbed into a larger geographic State agency, with each State assured of at least one agency. This provision would ensure that more WIC funds are used for participants rather than administrative expenses in areas which have few participants. (Sec. 204.)

State allocation of funds to local agencies.—The current requirement that local agencies be provided with funds "immediately" by State agencies would be deleted. This provision will thus remove the current haste with which some States are forced to act in the complex area of funds allocation. Because funding of a new local agency may entail an adjustment to funding for other local agencies in the State, sufficient time should be provided for the State to consider such factors and make equitable allocations. (Sec. 205.)

State flexibility in design of food package.—Permits States to reduce ratably the amount of food provided to program participants, except that such reductions to any participant may not exceed 20 percent. Permission to make reductions in food packages will permit States greater flexibility in managing WIC caseloads, particularly in response to changing caseload distribution within the State. (Sec. 206.)

WIC and commodity supplemental food program.—Prohibits operation of WIC in the same geographic area as the commodity supplemental food program. Because WIC and CSFP both serve similar populations and provide similar benefits, it would be more cost effective not to operate both programs in the same geographic area. The savings from what effectively amount to administrative consolidation will permit concentration of dollars for actual food benefits to participants. (Sec. 207.)

Proration of initial benefits.—Provides that the first month's benefits are prorated to the recipient based on the date of application. The current practice is to provide a household a full month's allotment for the month in which it applies. Proration has been required in initial benefits for the food stamp program and other Federal programs such as AFDC and SSI. (Sec. 208.)

Highest priority recipients.—Establishes in law the existing definition provided by regulation that the highest priority for WIC participation shall be pregnant women, breastfeeding women, and infants at nutritional risk as demonstratred by hematological or anthropometric measurements, or other documented nutritionally related medical conditions which demonstrate the persons' need for supplemental foods. (Sec. 209.)

Participation data.—Requires the Secretary to report to Congress annually on the characteristics of WIC participants, including income characteristics, nutritional risk designations, and priority classifications. (Sec. 210.)

Financial reports.—Removes the specific requirement for monthly submission of financial reports by State agencies in order to permit the Secretary latitude in requiring less frequent reports. (Sec. 210.)

Social security number.—Requires that recipients of WIC assistance furnish a social security number as a condition of eligibility, to assist in verification procedures. (Sec. 211.)

Nutrition education services.—Permits greater flexibility to the States in establishing nutrition education services. The existing requirement for the Secretary to prescribe precise standards is eliminated, as are the requirements that States provide training to persons providing nutrition education under the program and prepare annual evaluations of nutrition education services. Also eliminates the requirement that nutrition education materials be approved by the Department of Health and Human Services. (Sec. 212.)

State plans of operation.—Repeals the requirement specifying certain aspects which must be included in the State's plan of operation to be submitted to the Secretary, and thereby reduces the State's reporting requirements. Additionally, exempts the State from having to resubmit unchanged portions of the State's previous year plan. (Sec. 213.)

Public hearing. Makes optional the provision which currently requires public hearings on the State's proposed plan of operation and administration. The existing requirement for public hearings have proven costly and inefficient inasmuch as, in many instances, only a few participants attend each hearing. Because of the cost of such hearings, the provision makes such hearings optional, at the discretion of each State. Additionally, submission of written public comments to the State agency may be used to satisfy public comment. (Sec. 214.)

Migrants. Eliminates special requirements imposed on State agencies with regard to migrant households. It is anticipated that States can develop efficient means of serving all eligible households, including migrants, without specific, and costly, requirement. Additionally, the requirement that the Secretary prepare a report annually on migrant participation is also eliminated. This should also lessen the reporting requirements currently imposed on the States in order to provide information for the annual report. (Sec. 215.)

Application processing time. Extends the application processing time from 20 to 30 days to permit greater flexibility and conformity to other social service programs, such as the food stamp program. Additionally, the provision for shorter processing periods for people with special nutritional risks will be developed by the State, rather than the Secretary. (Sec. 216.)

Operating standards, withholding of funds. Eliminates the existing requirement that the Secretary prescribe operating standards for State agencies, including staffing standards. (Sec. 217.) Also, the provision gives the Secretary greater flexibility with regard to funds withheld because of improper State administration. Specifically, the provision deletes the requirement to provide any withheld funds to the State upon correction of any failure with State administration.

Bilingual materials. Eliminates the requirement that States provide nutrition education and other administrative materials in languages other than English. (Sec. 218.)

Duplicate participation.—Request that States ensure against participation by the same person in more than one jurisdiction. (Sec. 219.)

Retail store fraud.—Provides that retail stores disqualified from participation from the food stamp program for violations of that program shall also be ineligible to participate in the WIC program. (Sec. 220.)

Authorization.—Reauthorizes the program for fiscal year 1985 at $1,254,300,000. (Sec. 222.)

Administrative costs.—Reduces from 20 to 15 percent the portion of the funds provided under the program for administrative expenses of State and local agencies. This percentage applies both nationally and for each State. (Sec. 223.)

Nutrition education.—Eliminates requirement that one-sixth of administrative money be used for nutrition education, thereby providing greater flexibility for States and elimination of reporting requirements to the Secretary. (Sec. 223.)

Local agency allocation formulas.—Eliminates the requirement that States provide administrative funds to local agencies on the basis of allocation guidelines established by the Secretary. This would permit States to establish criteria for local agencies' administrative funding. (Sec. 223.)

Advance funding for local agencies.—Eliminates requirement that the State agencies provide advance funding for local agencies. This would permit greater discretion for intrastate allocation of administrative funding. (Sec. 223.)

National allocation formula.—Requires the Secretary, in making allocations among the States, to include in determining his formula the percentage of participants at greatest risk being served by the State agencies. Currently, the WIC program is not sufficiently targeted to those in greatest need. This provision would ensure that national appropriations are channeled to States serving the most recipients at greatest nutritional risk. (Sec. 224.)

Carryover of unused funds.—Permits up to 3 percent of the funds allocated to a State to be carried over for use in the next fiscal year. (Sec. 224.)

COMMODITY DISTRIBUTION

Commodity distribution.—Extends through fiscal year 1985 provisions to furnish commodities to certain child nutrition and elderly nutrition programs. (Sec. 301.)

STATE ADMINISTRATIVE EXPENSES

State administrative expenses.—Terminates the Federal funding for state administrative expenses at the end of fiscal year 1984. (Sec. 302.)

NUTRITION EDUCATION AND TRAINING

Nutrition education and training.—Terminates the Federal funding for nutrition education and training program at the end of fiscal year 1984. (Sec. 303.)

OTHER PROVISIONS

Technical and conforming changes.—Makes technical and conforming changes, such as changing references to the Department of Health, Education and Welfare to the Department of Health and Human Services. (Sec. 401.)

Effective date.—Makes the changes provided by the bill effective October 1, 1984, the beginning of fiscal year 1985. (Sec. 501.)●

SENATE RESOLUTION 364—RELATING TO CERTAIN RECOMMENDATIONS OF THE GRACE COMMISSION

Mr. DECONCINI (for himself, Mr. CRANSTON, Mr. RANDOLPH, and Mr. MATSUNAGA) submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Veterans' Affairs:

S. RES. 364

Whereas, the Department of Medicine and Surgery of the Veterans' Administration, established by an Act of the Congress, represents a national commitment by the Government to meet the medical needs of eligible veterans, especially those who have been disabled as a result of their military service; and

Whereas, section 409(a) of Public Law 97-306 states that it is the policy of the United States that the Veterans' Administration "shall maintain a comprehensive, nationwide health-care system for the direct provision of quality health care services to eligible veterans"; and

Whereas, the President's Private Sector Survey on Cost Control (commonly known as and hereinafter referred to as the "Grace Commission") has recommended that Veterans' Administration hospitals reduce the average length of stay of its inpatients to a level as comparable to that found in the private sector, and such recommendation fails to reflect any consideration of the fact that many Veterans' Administration hospital patients are severely disabled and that such situation is not typical in hospitals in the private sector; and

Whereas, the Grace Commission has recommended that funds for construction of Veterans' Administration hospitals not already under contract be deleted from the Veterans' Administration budget, that bids be invited from private hospital management companies to lease hospital facilities to the Veterans' Administration under long-term contracts, and that such facilities be managed by private companies under short-term performance contracts, and such recommendations are inconsistent with section 409(a) of Public Law 97-306; and

Whereas, the Grace Commission has recommended that nursing home construction by the Veterans' Administration be entirely discontinued and that the Veterans' Administration contract for the operation of nursing home care facilities by the private sector, and such recommendation is also inconsistent with section 409(a) of Public Law 97-306; and

Whereas, the Grace Commission has recommended that the Veterans' Administration eliminate such number of Veterans' Administration acute care hospital beds as is necessary to achieve an 80 percent occupancy rate for such beds, and such recommendation fails to take into account section 5010(a)(1) of title 38, United States Code, which requires the Veterans' Administration to operate and maintain a total of not less than 90,000 hospital and nursing home beds and such additional beds as may be necessary for the Veterans' Administration to meet its contingency obligations to assist the Department of Defense in times of war or national emergency in caring for the casualties of such war or national emergency; and

Whereas, the Grace Commission has recommended that the Veterans' Administration consider converting some underutilized acute health care facilities to extended health care facilities and phasing out old hospital facilities which may be in need of replacement or significant reconstruction, and such actions would not be appropriate in light of the demographic information compiled by the Veterans' Administration showing a forthcoming major increased demand on the Veterans' Administration from the aging veterans of World War II for acute as well as long-term care; and

Whereas, a joint study of the Grace Commission's recommendations conducted by the Congressional Budget Office and the General Accounting Office and submitted to Congress in February, 1984, concluded that the potential deficit reductions that might result in 1985 through 1987 from implementation of the Grace Commission's recommendations would be much smaller than the three year savings projected by the Commission; and

Whereas, the Senate desires to reassure veterans that the Senate remains firmly committed to an independent and comprehensive, nationwide health care system within the Veterans' Administration, capable of providing quality care to eligible veterans: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that the aforementioned recommendations of the President's Private Sector Survey on Cost Control relating to the Veterans' Administration health care system should be rejected as a matter of national policy.

Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, I am pleased to be joined by Senator CRANSTON, the distinguished ranking minority member of the Senate Committee on Veterans' Affairs, and by my distinguished colleagues on that committee, Senators RANDOLPH and MATSUNAGA, in introducing a resolution to express the sense of the Senate that certain recommendations of the Grace Commission relating to the Veterans' Administration health care system be rejected. I believe these recommendations are insensitive to veterans, are inconsistent with existing law, and pose a threat to the integrity of a comprehensive, independent, and nationwide health care system within the Veterans' Administration.

The focus of the Grace Commission's recommendations is to transfer as much responsibility as possible from the public to the private sector in the belief that the private sector can deliver required services in a more effective and cost-efficient manner. What the Grace Commission fails to understand is that many of its cost savings proposals in the area of veterans' health care undermine a long-standing contract the Government has made to provide comprehensive health care services to eligible veterans, especially those who have been disabled as a result of their military service. Transferring major components of the VA health care system to the private sector represents a fundamental change in Government policy on the delivery of health care services to veterans and has been interpreted by veterans as the first step toward dismantling the existing system. The proposed transfer of these services to the private sector is also inconsistent with section 401 of Public Law 97-306 which states that it is the policy of the United States that the Veterans' Administration "shall maintain a comprehensive, nationwide health-care system for the direct provision of quality health care services to eligible veterans."

The resolution I am introducing today specifically opposes the following recommendations of the Grace Commission:

That the average length of hospital stays in VA facilities be reduced to a level comparable to that found in the private sector;

That funds for VA hospital construction, not already under contract, be deleted from the budget;

That bids be invited from private hospital management companies to lease hospital facilities to the VA under long-term contracts;

That VA hospital facilities be managed by private companies under short-term performance contracts;

That VA nursing home construction be entirely discontinued;

That acute care VA hospital beds be reduced, as necessary, to achieve an 80-percent occupancy rate for such beds; and

That some underutilized acute health care facilities be converted to extended health care facilities and that old hospital facilities which may be in need of replacement or significant reconstruction be phased out.

I hope you share my view that these recommendations should be rejected as a matter of national policy. If we hope to attract future generations of Americans into the service, then we have an obligation to honor the commitments we have made to those who have already served.

I believe it is important for the Senate to reaffirm its commitment to a comprehensive, independent, and quality health care system within the Veterans' Administration, and invite all my colleagues to support this resolution.

AMENDMENTS SUBMITTED

FEDERAL BOAT SAFETY ACT AMENDMENTS

METZENBAUM AMENDMENT NO. 2903

Mr. METZENBAUM submitted an amendment to amendment No. 2902 proposed by Mr. DOLE (and Mr. LONG) to the bill (H.R. 2163) to amend the Federal Boat Safety Act of 1971, and for other purposes; as follows:

On page 986, beginning on line 18 strike out all of section 828 of the amendment (dealing with Employee Achievement Awards).

PRESSLER AMENDMENT NO. 2904

(Ordered to lie on the table.)

Mr. PRESSLER submitted an amendment to amendment No. 2902 proposed by Mr. DOLE (and Mr. LONG) to the bill H.R. 2163, supra; as follows:

Beginning on page 817, line 14, strike out all through page 819, line 9, and insert in lieu thereof the following new section:

SEC. 601. REPEAL OF INCREASE IN HIGHWAY USE TAX AND INCREASE IN DIESEL FUEL TAX.

(a) REPEAL OF INCREASE IN HIGHWAY USE TAX.—

(1) IN GENERAL.—Subsection (a) of section 513 of the Highway Revenue Act of 1982 is repealed.

(2) CONFORMING AMENDMENT.—Subsection (f) of section 513 of the Highway Revenue Act of 1982 is amended to read as follows:

"(f) EFFECTIVE DATE.—The amendments made by this section shall take effect on July 1, 1984.".

(b) EFFECTIVE DATE.—The amendments made by subsection (a) shall take effect on July 1, 1984.

● Mr. PRESSLER. Mr. President, today I am introducing a technical substitute to my amendment to the portion of the Senate Finance Committee package dealing with truck heavy user fees (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, April 2, 1984, page 7395). My amendment would repeal the increase in one-time, flat user fees and make up the entire revenue differential with a 6-cents per gallon pay-as-you-go diesel fuel tax. As opposed to the Finance Committee's compromise proposal which would cut the use tax to $600, my amendment would return to the $240 use tax maximum.

The following is a comparison of the key elements of the various proposals:

	Surface Transportation Assistance Act of 1982 (to begin July 1, 1984)	Finance Committee compromise	Pressler amendment
Maximum use tax	$1,900	$600	$240
Diesel tax per gallon	9 cents	15 cents	15 cents.
Weight categories (GVW=gross vehicle weight)	Tax schedule begins at 33,000 lbs. GVW; maximum of $1,900 assessed at 80,000 lbs. GVW.	Tax schedule begins at 55,000 lbs. GVW; maximum of $600 assessed at 80,000 lbs. GVW.	Tax schedule begins at 26,000 lbs. GVW; maximum of $240 assessed at 80,000 lbs. GVW.
Diesel tax exemptions (farm and other off-road vehicles totally exempt).	No additional exemption for vehicles under 10,000 lbs. GVW..	6 cents exemption for vehicles under 10,000 lbs. GVW	6 cents exemption for vehicles under 10,000 lbs. GVW.
Total revenue raised from 1984 to 1988 (in billions)	65.0	65.0	65.1.

This amendment is needed to protect the smaller trucking companies and help them survive. It is unfair to ask someone who travels 40,000 miles to pay the same amount of use tax as someone who travels 200,000 miles.

I urge my colleagues to join me in cosponsoring this amendment and hope you will vote for its passage.●

KENNEDY AMENDMENT NO. 2905

Mr. KENNEDY proposed an amendment to amendment No. 2902 proposed by Mr. DOLE (and Mr. LONG) which was subsequently modified) to the bill H.R. 2163, supra; as follows:

At the appropriate place in the Dole amendment, add the following new section:

"SEC. . It is the sense of the Congress that—

(a) no funds heretofore or hereafter appropriated in any Act of Congress shall be obligated or expanded for the purpose of planning, directing, executing, or supporting the mining of the ports or territorial waters of Nicaragua.

(b) The United States shall immediately withdraw the modification submitted on April 6, 1984, to the jurisdiction of the International Court of Justice over the United States with respect to disputes with any Central American state or arising out of or related to events in Central America.

"(1) if a domestic corporation and a foreign corporation are stapled entities, the foreign corporation shall be treated as a domestic corporation.

"(2) In applying section 1563, stock in a second corporation which constitutes a stapled interest with respect to stock of a first corporation shall be treated as owned by such first corporation, and

(B) at least 75 percent of the gross income of the trust is derived from interest on obligations secured by mortgages on real property (as defined in section 856) and interest on such obligations made or acquired by the trust (other than to persons who are independent contractors (as defined in section 856(d)(3)) is at either an arms length rate of a rate not more than 1 percentage point greater than the associated borrowing costs of the trust.

(4) CERTAIN STAPLED ENTITIES WHICH INCLUDE PUERTO RICAN CORPORATIONS.—

(A) Paragraph (1) of Section 269B(a) of such Code shall not apply to a domestic corporation and a qualified Puerto Rican corporation which, on June 30, 1983, were stapled entities.

(B) For purposes of subparagraph (A), the term "qualified Puerto Rican corporation" means any corporation organized in Puerto Rico—

(B) ELECTION.—Any election under subparagraph (A) shall be made not later than 180 days after the date of the enactment of this Act and shall be made in such manner as the Secretary of the Treasury or his delegate shall prescribe.

(C) ELECTION IRREVOCABLE.—Any election under subparagraph (A), once made, may be revoked only with the consent of the Secretary of the Treasury or his delegate.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I am proposing an amendment to the Finance Committee to H.R. 2163, which will add to the bill an important antiabuse provision correctly included in the House bill. The amendment would preclude widely held U.S. corporations from avoiding controlled foreign corporation status under subpart F of the Internal Revenue Code by spinning off a foreign subsidiary to its shareholders with the foreign stock paired with, or stapled to, the domestic stock so that two stocks trade in tandem. The targeted technique also allows U.S. companies to avoid the antiboycott rules of the Tax Code and this potential is also eliminated under the proposal.

A similar abuse exists in connection with real estate investment trusts, which abuse the House bill and my amendment would eliminate. When real estate investment trusts own real estate and provide substantial services to lessees, they can avoid the restriction in the real estate investment trust provisions of the code against the trusts providing substantial services by placing the services activities in a corporation whose stock is paired with, or stapled to, the interests in the trust. The House bill precludes this abusive practice but goes beyond the noted abuse and unnecessarily prevents all paired relationships between a corporation and a real estate investment trust, including legitimate capital formation techniques where the paired trust is used exclusively to invest in real estate mortgages as contrasted with equity positions in real estate. This is not abusive and my amendment makes this important distinction.

Thus, in addition to the protection already accorded in the House bill to existing structures established in reliance on the current law, my amendment would protect the right of U.S. corporations to use real estate investment trusts for the benefit of their shareholders for legitimate capital formation, and nontax motivated, purposes. Appropriate safeguards are included to assure that continuation of the present law's treatment for these nonabusive situations cannot be used in an abusive manner.

The amendment would raise close to $5 million in revenues.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be printed immediately following my remarks.

ADDITIONAL STATEMENTS

SOCIAL SECURITY DISABILITY PROGRAM NEEDS REVISION

● Mr. SASSER. Mr. President, I rise today to address an issue which has recently attracted considerable attention in the House of Representatives, and one which I have been involved in for more than 2 years now.

The gross inequities and injustices which have been inflicted upon nearly one-half million disabled Americans over the past 3 years due to this administration's handling of the periodic social security disability review process is a national disgrace. In my home State of Tennessee, it is estimated that over 65 percent of the 15,000 disabled individuals who have appealed the termination of their benefits were found by administrative law judges to have been wrongfully deprived of those benefits.

Despite repeated attempts by myself and fellow colleagues in this body to call attention to this issue by passing comprehensive reform legislation to deal with this problem, relatively little has been done to resolve the situation. In 1982, we passed temporary legislation to protect disabled beneficiaries during the appeals process and last year that protection was temporarily extended for an additional 67 days. However, the current disability review process cries out not for temporary solutions but rather for comprehensive revisions which would insure equitable and fair treatment for those in the unenviable position of not being able to care for themselves.

In October of last year, along with Senators MOYNIHAN and PRYOR, I introduced S. 2002, which provides for substantive comprehensive reform of the existing disability review process. Now let there be no doubt, if there are individuals who do not belong on the disability rolls then they should not receive benefits. But to conduct a purge of the rolls in an attempt to achieve budget savings, and in the process callously disregard the rights and dignity of eligible disability beneficiaries is simply intolerable and must be corrected. The legislation that we have proposed would go a long way toward restoring the fundamental notion of fairness back into a social security disability system which has run amok.

Support for the provisions contained in S. 2002 was overwhelmingly demonstrated on March 27 in the House. A companion bill offered by Congressman PICKLE, who is the chairman of the Social Security Subcommittee of the House Ways and Means Committee, passed by a vote of 410 to 1. No clearer indication of congressional dissatisfaction with the current disability review process is needed. We must take legislative action, and we must take that action now.

The administration, in advance of impending defeat on this issue, decided to reverse their previously stated position on the matter and announced that they were drafting an 18-month moratorium on disability terminations. It appears that the administration is finally facing up to the errors of their ways.

However, I, for one, am not satisfied with the administrative remedies alledgedly being considered by the administration. After all, it was administrative folly which precipitated the wholesale terminations in the first place. Further, there is nothing to stop the administration from lifting the moratorium prior to the October 1, 1985 expiration date. Thus, I would like to state for the record here today, my intention to continue to work for passage of the comprehensive disability legislation that Senators MOYNIHAN, PRYOR, and I have introduced.

I recognize that Senators COHEN, LEVIN, and HEINZ have shown an intense interest in this problem over the past 2 years and have been diligent in their efforts to seek reform of the current system. In fact, they have indicated that they also intend to pursue separate legislation, S. 476, at the earliest possible time.

I am a cosponsor of the legislation, S. 476, and will support it when it comes before the Senate. However, let me state for the record that there are several provisions in that bill which I feel do not adequately address some of the problems existent in the current disability review process.

S. 2002 contains a provision which requires a face-to-face evidentiary hearing at the initial level of decision. This, I feel is extremely important in that it allows for the State agency reviewers to encounter disabled individuals in person prior to their termination. S. 476 only allows for demonstration projects in five States. S. 2002 provides for the continuation of benefits through the appeals process up to the administrative law judge level of appeal on a permanent basis. S. 476 provides for the continuation of benefits only through June 1, 1986, and for payments not to extend past January 1987.

S. 2002 requires the Social Security Administration (SSA) to apply circuit court decisions uniformly unless they are appealed to the Supreme Court. S. 476 only asks that SSA inform Congress on why they either acquiesce or not in circuit court decisions.

These differences are significant. In recent field hearings held in Memphis and Nashville, I listened to individuals who had been adversely affected by the current disability review process and to professionals who deal with individuals affected by the process. They were unanimous in their support for the provisions contained in S. 2002.

These hearings reconfirmed my worst fears concerning the well-documented abuses operative in the existing disability review process. It is my sincere hope that this Senate will consider S. 2002 at the earliest possible time and give the bill the same degree of support it enjoyed in the House.

We simply cannot allow the current process to continue any longer.●

IMPACT OF THE ERA V. VETERAN'S BENEFITS

● Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, during recent hearings by the Subcommittee on the Constitution, there was a general consensus expressed by both proponents and opponents of the equal rights amendment that the ERA would require special scrutiny of certain kinds of veteran's benefits, in particular veteran's preference hiring policies in the Federal and State civil service. I ask to have printed in the RECORD at this point an outstanding statement on this issue prepared by Prof. Gary McDowell, professor of political science at Tulane University and a codirector of the Center for the Study of the Constitution in Carlisle, Pa.

The statement follows:

THE IMPACT OF THE EQUAL RIGHTS AMENDMENT UPON VETERANS' PROGRAMS

Some version of an Equal Rights Amendment has been introduced in every Congress since 1923. Yet it was not until 1972 that a version finally passed both houses and headed for the states. Since the defeat of that proposed Amendment on June 30, 1982, and the introduction of the present version on January 26, 1983, the politics surrounding the ERA has reached a fever pitch. The problem is that the procedure of amending our fundamental law—a procedure described by the Framers as a most "solemn and authoritative act"—has come to be the object of such popular frenzy that we have lost sight of taking serious note of the sorts of changes such an amendment would bring to our system of governance. During an election year when the rhetorical edges of the ERA debate will inevitably be honed sharper still, this committee is to be commended for attempting to introduce a bit of sober reflection on the practical effects of the proposed ERA.

Too often, public debate focuses almost exclusively on the philosophical implications of the ERA; its practical effects on public policy generally receive, at best, superficial notice. But it is at that level of policy rather than the level of principle where public attention needs most to be drawn. While all decent instincts demand in principle an equality of treatment for women before the law, the administration of the institutions of government in light of that principle is what will touch the governed most immediately. Thus, the most politically relevant question is what the ERA will mean in practice; what will its concrete effect be on the way in which to seek to govern ourselves?

A consideration of the relation of the ERA to veterans' programs (at both the federal and state levels) expose a fundamental practical question of administration. Is the standard of equal protection to be the standard of discriminatory intent or the standard of discriminatory impact? In brief, would a law contravene the ERA if in practice it led to a disproportionately discriminatory impact on women regardless of its intent? The answer to these questions will have far reaching impact on public policy should the ERA be ratified. The veterans' programs bring this question of standards into sharpest focus because traditionally more men than women have been veterans; any program intended to benefit veterans over non-veterans, then, has to a degree the apparent effect of benefitting men at the expense of women. The issue is whether preferential programs for veterans would violate the ERA. It seems clear to me that they would.

The policy of creating preferential programs for the hiring of veterans is neither new nor limited. While the forms such programs take may vary widely—from a point-advantage system to an absolute preference program—the underlying legislative is much the same. The programs traditionally have been justified as a "measure designed to reward veterans for the sacrifices of military service, to ease the transition from military to civilian life, to encourage patriotic service, and to attract loyal and well-disciplined people to civil service occupations." (Massachusetts v. Feeney, 442 U.S. 256, 265 (1978).) they have existed in various jurisdictions since shortly after the Civil War; and they "have been challenged so often that the rationale for their support has become essentially standardized." (at 265, n. 12). While there has nearly always been criticism of such programs from various quarters, the general political sense of the community seems to have remained constant that such preferential treatment for veterans is a decent and desirable public policy.

But even if a substantial case could be made that such policies fall short of prudence, or are simply unfair, they would not of necessity violate the Constitution (at least as the Constitution now stands, without the ERA). For as James Wilson saw fit to remind his fellow-delegates to the Federal Convention of 1787, "Laws may be unjust, may be unwise, may be dangerous, may be destructive; . . . and yet not be . . . unconstitutional." It is this question of whether or not the ERA would render such preferential policies unconstitutional that is the central concern. In particular, would the ratification of the ERA have the effect of overturning the authoritative Supreme Court opinion on this issue, Personnel Administrator of Massachusetts v. Feeney.

The question brought in Feeney was whether Massachusetts' absolute lifetime preference to veterans discriminated against women in violation of the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. The Court held that it did not. The logic of Justice Stewart's opinion was simple and direct. "The equal protection guarantee of the Fourteenth Amendment does not take from the States all power of classification"; "When the basic classification is rationally based, uneven effects upon particular groups within a class are ordinarily of no constitutional concern"; "The calculus of effect, the manner in which a particular law reverberates in a society, is a legislative and not a judicial responsibility"; "In assessing an equal protection challenge, a court is called upon only to measure the basic validity of the legislative classification." (442 U.S. 256, 271-272). The conclusion, to Justice Stewart, was inescapable: any neutral law that has a "disproportionally adverse effect" upon a particular group is "unconstitutional under the Equal Protection Clause only if that impact can be traced to a discriminatory purpose." (id. at 272; see Washington v. Davis, 426 U.S. 229 ( ) and Arlington Heights v. Metropolitan Housing Development Corp. 429 U.S. 252 ( ).) It is only "purposeful discrimination" that offends the Constitution; disparate impact does not.

On the basis of Feeney, programs designed to confer preferential consideration on veterans are based on a gender-neutral classification between veterans and nonveterans; that more men tend to be veterans than women is beside the constitutional point. Even if a legislature is aware of such a potential disproportionate impact, such awareness is not the same thing as discriminatory purpose. An inference of discriminatory intent drawn from the evidence of a disproportionate impact, is not sufficient to violate the constitutional right to equal protection of the laws. Inference is not proof of intent. (442 U.S. 256, 279, n. 25). Veterans' preference programs do not reflect a purpose to discriminate on the basis of sex; they reflect a legislative intention to benefit veterans over non-veterans of either sex, not to benefit men over women.

The ratification of the ERA would be likely to lead to the abandonment of this standard of discriminatory intent in favor of the standard of discriminatory impact. That this is so seems clear for three reasons. First, the proposed ERA is, at best, ambiguous. The result of such textual ambiguity is to invite—nay, demand—judicial intrusion in order to determine as precisely as possible what the Amendment actually means. (The ERA if adopted would be, as Walter Berns has pointed out, the only provision in the Constitution bestowing or protecting a right without identifying the right.) Given the common sense view that if the ERA is ratified it must mean something other than what the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment means (if not, why adopt it?) then it must tighten considerably the standards of what constitutes a violation of equal rights. The standard of discriminatory impact is undoubtedly a tighter standard than discriminatory intent. Thus, logically, it would seem fair to assume that under the ERA the standard for proving unconstitutional discrimination against women would be discriminatory impact.

The second reason this movement seems likely is that on this question of impact versus intent, the Supreme Court in Feeney was split. Dissenting from the majority, Justices Marshall and Brennan were willing to strike down the veterans' preference law in that case because in their view when "the foreseeable impact of a facially neutral policy is so disproprotionate, the burden should rest on the State to establish that sex-based considerations played no part in the choice of the particular legislative scheme." (442 U.S. 256, 284). With the ERA rather than the Fourteenth Amendment serving as the constitutional point of departure for such inquiries into allegations of gender-based discrimination, it would not be surprising to find the logic of Marshall and Brennan more persuasive.

The third and final reason such a movement from the standard of intent to the standard of impact seems likely is that most if not all of the proponents of the ERA argue that such a movement would in fact be the desired result of ratification. Dorothy Riddings of the League of Women Voters has suggested that such veterans' preference laws as the one at issue in Feeney would "fall in a challenge under the ERA." Prof. Ann Freedman of Rutgers Law School, a leading theoretician of the ERA, has argued before the House of Representatives that "strict judicial scrutiny under the ERA would be required if a neutral rule that has a disparate impact on members of one sex is traceable to or perpetuates discriminatory patterns similar to those associated with facial discrimination." The analysis of Justices Marshall's and Brennan's dissent in Feeney, Professor Freedman believes "illustrates the approach required by the ERA." Prof. Thomas Emerson of Yale also testified to the fact that the "outcome of Feeney would plainly be different under the ERA."

As Professor Emerson went on to explain: "While the Massachusetts' veterans preference statute considered in Feeney may not have denied 'equal protection of the laws' (14th Amendment), it certainly denies 'equality of rights under the law.' The fact that there was not overt intention to harm women would not be decisive; the result arising from habitual patterns of exclusion was there for all to see and feel." (Congressional Record 2029 February 7, 1984; emphasis supplied).

As leading legal authorities on the Equal Rights Amendment, the view of Professors Freedman and Emerson would surely be influential in shaping the sorts of arguments that would be brought to bear on the question of intent versus impact in the flood of litigation that would undoubtedly be released by the ratification of the ERA.

This view is not one that is merely whispered in scholarly closets; the legal profession has been greatly influenced by it. Martha Barnett of the American Bar Association has argued in favor of supplanting the standard of discriminatory intent with the standard of discriminatory impact. "The principle of equality," she suggested, "is rendered impotent if it cannot reach laws which effectively exclude women from employment for which they are fully qualified and competent." (Congressional Record, 2029)

It is these three factors, then—the ambiguity of the proposed amendment; a judiciary somewhat divided on the question of intent versus impact; and the rather clear position of those most likely to press for the impact standard in litigation under the ERA—that I believe would come together and lead to the abandonment of the standard of intent in favor of the standard of impact and thus lead to veterans' preference programs being declared unconstitutional violations of "equality of rights under the law."●

HON. DAVID P. McDONALD

ON IMMIGRATION, FIRST THINGS FIRST

● Mr. EAST. Mr. President, the American people want our immigration laws enforced. Yet Congress refuses to give the Immigration and Naturalization Service the resources to do that job.

Instead, Congress seems determined to grant amnesty to millions of illegal aliens prior to regaining control over our borders. In the March 23 issue of the Los Angeles Times. Prof. William G. Hollingsworth of the University of Tulsa makes a convincing argument that such a premature amnesty would only make the illegal alien problem worse. I hope my colleagues in both the Senate and House of Representatives will carefully consider his cogent essay before enacting any amnesty plan. I ask that his article "On Immigration, First Things First—Amnesty for Illegal Aliens Must Await Control of Our Borders"—be printed in the RECORD.

The article referred to follows:

ON IMMIGRATION, FIRST THINGS FIRST—AMNESTY FOR ILLEGAL ALIENS MUST AWAIT CONTROL OF OUR BORDERS

(By William G. Hollingsworth)

Already massive, the tide of illegal immigration into the United States continues to rise. As both population and distress explode elsewhere, that tide will keep rising.

The Simpson-Mazzoli bill is the closest that Congress has come to facing the problem. The bill passed the Senate last spring and may come before the House again, probably in amended form this year.

Simpson-Mazzoli originally proposed sanctions on employers who knowingly hire undocumented persons, but that scheme weakened under intense lobbying by groups ranging from the American Civil Liberties Union to the Western Growers Assn.

At present, employers must rely on Social Security cards and drivers' licenses, which are counterfeited by the millions. A reliable ID system would make sanctions fair and workable—but even if one were devised it probably would be politically unsellable.

Never mind that a truly reliable verification system would prevent discrimination against Latino or other legal residents whose status an employer otherwise might doubt. And never mind that illegal immigration most hurts low-income U.S. citizens, often blacks and Latinos, with whom the immigrants so often compete for jobs. Prestigious groups and individuals have warned that, no matter how restricted its use, any government-issued ID card would in fact be seen as an "internal passport."

In any case, penalizing employers would only be an aid in controlling illegal immigration. The Simpson-Mazzoli bill would still leave us with a ludicrously underfunded Immigration and Naturalization Service, with an equipment-poor and token-size border patrol and with no adequate system for ensuring the exit of millions of temporary visa holders.

The bill does recommend "a controlled and closely monitored increase" in border patrol and INS enforcement activities. But even this cautious approach depends totally on congressional appropriations year by year. In today's budgetary climate the chances for an adequately funded INS are slight. In truth, the Simpson-Mazzoli bill is no more than a very partial step toward the control of illegal immigration.

Several million undocumented aliens now reside in the United States. Both compassion and practicality require that those who have lived here long enough to acquire an "equity" in this nation be granted an amnesty leading to full citizenship. Compared to most immigration issues, amnesty is a popular cause. Thus there is a great temptation for Congress to grant amnesty prematurely. Simpson-Mazzoli succumbs to that temptation. In doing so it makes an enormous mistake. Until illegal immigration has been brought under control, granting vested amnesty rights is folly, for two reasons.

A premature amnesty would encourage increased illegal entry. A nation so eager to grant unconditional amnesty before law prevails appears more than willing to extend it to those who arrive in the future. It announces to the world that we are not serious about enforcing our immigration laws.

And to grant vested amnesty rights before we control our borders minimizes the chances that Congress will enact measures adequate to gain that control.

By going ahead with the easy task (amnesty) before accomplishing the difficult task (enactment of adequate controls), those in Congress who wish to curtail illegal immigration will have surrendered essential leverage. They will have too little bargaining power to effect the needed legislation.

By putting the cart of amnesty before the horse of secure borders, the effort to control illegal entry will remain at a standstill. Illegal immigration will escalate from a crisis into a nightmare.

Because no one can predict an adequate strategy for restoring control over the nation's borders, Congress should authorize full amnesty contingent on achieving the following:

Greatly increase Immigration Service and Border Patrol capability for enforcing our immigration laws. Underfunding of immigration law enforcement is false economy. The displacement of U.S. workers, just one social cost of illegal immigration, may be costing $35 billion per year in unemployment benefits and other public assistance.

Enact a credible scheme of employer sanctions if politically possible.

Grant provisional but non-expirable residency and work permits (generally without government benefits) to all illegal aliens who have resided here since at least, January, 1981.

Stipulate that the above persons (but not later arrivals) will receive full residency status with access to government benefits and, in due course, U.S. citizenship—as soon as the President certifies to Congress that subsequent illegal immigration is occurring only at an insubstantial level.

Thus full-benefits amnesty would be contingent on the achievement of adequate control over our borders. Otherwise there will be too little pressure on Congress to gain that control.

It is an unfair argument to say that the contingent approach keeps longtime illegal residents in limbo. Those inclined to make his argument have the political clout to help render it totally moot. With broader political support, Congress and the President would move swiftly to control illegal immigration soon creating the conditions under which full-fledged amnesty could be sensibly effected.

Until the United States regains sovereignty over its own borders, the whole nation is in limbo. And the outlook for jobless U.S. citizens is even worse.●

FEDERAL CHARTER AWARDED TO NATIONAL ACADEMY OF PUBLIC ADMINISTRATION

● Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, I would like to call attention to the recent action by the Senate on passing legislation to award a long-deserved charter to the National Academy of Public Administration.

Composed of scholars and leading practitioners of public administration, the National Academy has been dedicated to advancing effective government since its founding 17 years ago. It is only fitting that we in Congress, also dedicated to more effective government, recognize the many accomplishments of the National Academy and accord it the status of a chartered institution.

The National Academy has responded to Federal, State, and local government agency requests for help in solving problems associated with particular programs, processes, or organizational structures. Its study and advice have been heeded time and time again to the benefit of Government agencies.

The range of its contributions is great. It has lent its expertise to the effective management of the U.S. Postal Service, the Presidency, the civil service, and the Environmental Protection Agency. It has made studies and recommendations on issues ranging from the management of commercial radioactive waste and the data processing and telecommunications functions in the Department of the Treasury, to Government-business cooperation in developing space technologies, and space remote sensing and the private sector.

On broad concerns of Government, the National Academy has held workshops on the role of American Government, it has studied the issue of revitalizing Federal management, and it has produced a comprehensive productivity handbook for State and local government.

I would like to laud the National Academy of Public Administration for these and many other contributions it has made toward making our Government work better. I would also like to congratulate the National Academy members and their chairman, Phillip S. Hughes, Under Secretary of the Smithsonian Institution, on gaining a charter. I hope that in the future Government will call the National Academy even more often for its counsel.●

APPROPRIATIONS FOR CORPORATION FOR PUBLIC BROADCASTING AND PUBLIC TELECOMMUNICATIONS FACILITIES PROGRAMS

● Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I rise today in support of S. 2436, which authorizes appropriations for the Corporation for Public Broadcasting (CPB) and for the public telecommunications facilities programs (PTFP).

The CPB is the administrative organization that distributes Federal funds to public television and radio stations, which provide information and entertainment to the citizens of this Nation. Children utilize public television in a special way; programs designed to help youth develop their mathematical, reading, and scientific skills are integral to their early education and are an important supplement to formal education processes. Public television also offers a wide variety of programs for adults, ranging from news and commentary programs to indepth documentaries on science and technology. The funds distributed through the CPB help to broaden the cultural perspectives of our entire population.

We, in Congress, must act on the President's initiative to increase the quality and value of this Nation's educational system. Education of our youth is the responsibility of every parent, every teacher, and especially, every legislator. Since children spend a considerable amount of their free time watching television, it is important that educational programing is available during this time. Childrens' programs supported by the CPB are often the first educational experience for many preschool children. This service may be the greatest single achievement of public television.

Adults benefit from CPB-supported programs to a great extent as well. High quality cultural, dramatic, informative, and instructual programing available via public television offers a pragmatic alternative to the programing offered by the major networks. Funding the CPB will help maintain and expand this type of personally enriching programing, from which all Americans can benefit.

In order for the CPB to help in the education of our population, the young as well as the old, we must enable the broadcasts it supports to reach every area of the Nation. Expansions of the existing telecommunications network to areas presently outside the system must be achieved, along with the modernization of existing facilities. Thus, I support my distinguished colleague and good friend, Senator GOLDWATER, in calling for the authorization of the necessary funds for the PTFP, as well as for the financially struggling CPB.

Education is a necessary prerequisite for, and function of, a Democratic Republic. The high cost of broadcasting quality programs, however, exceeds private donations. By authorizing the necessary funds for the CPB and PTFP to allow the continuation and expansion of the current high quality of public broadcasting, we are performing an invaluable service to all Americans.

Mr. President, I urge my colleagues to join with me as cosponsors on this important bill.●

MILITARY POTENTIAL OF PEOPLE'S REPUBLIC OF CHINA

● Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, appearing in the spring issue of Parameters, which is the journal of the U.S. Army War College, is a very fine résumé of the military capabilities and situation of the People's Republic of China. I am asking that this appear in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD because the President of our country will be traveling to the People's Republic in the very near future, and I think it would be very wise for all of us to have a real idea of what the People's Republic looks like militarily, so that any tendencies he might have to yield to the pressures that will be exerted on him to sell technical equipment and arms to that part of the world, which has never been anything but enemies of ours, might be reexamined.

I ask that this article be printed in the RECORD.

The article follows:

WESTERN SECURITY AND THE MILITARY POTENTIAL OF THE PRC

(By A. James Gregor)

Washington's apparent willingness to move beyond the implicit counterweight strategy with the People's Republic of China toward more active collaboration against the Soviet Union, including the possible sale of weapons and weapon-related technology to Beijing, has precipitated wide-ranging private and public debate in the United States.[1] Other than the diplomatic and political significance such developments might entail, one of the central questions involves the conceivable military consequences of such sales and transfers. To what degree might the sale of weapons systems to the People's Liberation Army of the PRC alter the current military balance along the Sino-Soviet border to the advantage of mainland China and the collateral advantage of the anti-Soviet Western powers? Whatever arguments might be made for the political or diplomatic benefits such transfers might afford, there remains the central concern with the balance of forces along the Sino-Soviet border.

Any effort to respond to such questions necessitates a review of the present military capabilities of the PRC in its prevailing security environment, conjoined with some judgment of its potential for development. What seems clear is the fact that although the armed forces of the PRC are large in absolute terms, they are beset by disabilities of considerable magnitude. Those disabilities afflict every branch of the armed services of communist China, and their redress appears to be beyond the medium and probably the long-term capabilities of both the Western powers and the Beijing regime itself.

THE ARMED FORCES OF THE PRC

The PLA, which embraces all communist Chinese arms and services, including strategic nuclear, naval, and air defense components, is the largest military organization in the world.[2] It is composed of approximately 4.7 million men under arms serving in units organized in 11 Military Regions divided into 29 Military Districts. This mass is divided into Main and Local Forces. Main Force divisions are the primary force constituents and are better armed than Local Forces, which are intended to defend local areas and provide troops for border defense and internal security. There are about 190 Main Force divisions in about 40 army corps, including 121 foot infantry, 12 armored, and three airborne divisions. Artillery, engineer, railway, production, and construction corps units make up the remainder of the ground force manpower, and all are commanded by the Ministry of National Defense. Local Force divisions seem to be under the command of the leadership of the military regions. There are approximately 85 infantry divisions and 130 independent regiments in the Local Forces.

Footnotes at end of article.

In addition there are common militia units, composed of anywhere from 50 to 200 million nominal participants. The People's Militia receives little military training in general, and its common militia units receive little in the way of military equipment. About 15 million members of the common militia are entered into basic organizational units under the leadership of retired PLA officers, who exercise with them once or twice a year with active-duty PLA personnel. Of the 15 million, about five million men and women are selected to provide the manpower for security partols and for general militia training. Armaments for the select units of the militia are usually restricted to infantry weapons, although some urban militia units have received antitank and antiaircraft weaponry.

Under combat conditions the Main Force divisions are expected to engage directly the enemy's main forces. The Local Forces serve to provide local self-defense and the leadership for irregular warfare units composed of the best trained of the People's Militia. The general militia forces constitute manpower reserves and simple labor power for field forces.

The overwhelming feature of the PLA is its foot-mobile character. Although the communist Chinese have about 11,000 tanks in inventory—approximately the same number as found in the armed forces of the United States—the ratio of active personnel available to tanks leaves the PLA seriously disadvantaged in any confrontation with Soviet forces. If the category "armored vehicles" is taken to include both tanks and the 3,500 armored personnel carriers the PLA has in service, the ratio of personnel to armored vehicles is about 241:1, compared to a Soviet ratio of personnel to armored vehicles of 20:1. In effect, the PLA has very limited strategic and tactical mobility. The 20,000 field guns and rocket launchers, and 6,000 heavy mortars, of the PRC armed forces are relatively obsolescent. Given the size of the infantry forces of the PLA, it becomes apparent that the PRC military conspicuously lacks both armored mobility and firepower in the field. These disabilities are compounded by the fact that the air force of the PLA, while large in absolute numbers (5,300 combat aircraft), remains critically deficient in terms of modern weapon platforms, modern weapon systems, and modern electronic warfare ancillaries. Against any modern opponent, it is doubtful whether the air force could contest tactical air control over the battlefield, much less obtain general air supremacy. Without tactical air control, the foot soldiers of the PLA could expect only episodic air support. Hampered by a lack of armored mobility and impaired in terms of firepower, the infantry units of the PLA would suffer grievously from the air strikes that certainly would be launched with relative impunity by any modern adversary.

On the seas, the communist Chinese deploy the world's third largest navy in terms of combatants. None of those combatants, however, is larger than a destroyer—and most are coastal defense craft ranging from gun, torpedo, and missile boats through frigates armed with surface-to-surface missiles. Those surface combatants are supplemented by the world's third largest fleet of attack surmarines. The approximately 100 attack boats in the navy of the PRC are conventionally powered, Chinese-constructed replicas of Soviet submarines of the 1950s (there are about 80 Romeo and 20 Whiskey class diesel-powered boats in inventory).

Other than the surface and subsurface combatants, there are approximately 800 shore-based aircraft assigned to the PLA navy. They provide the air defense for the combat vessels of the fleet. The force is composed of about 100 torpedo bombers, 50 light bombers, and 600 fighter aircraft including domestically constructed MiG-15s, MiG-17s, and MiG-19s. The remainder of the force is composed of light transport aircraft and about 40 helicopters.

Beyond the conventional forces available to Beijing, there are strategic nuclear forces under the control of the Second Artillery, the nuclear missile arm of the PLA. At present, the offensive nuclear weapons available to the PRC constitute modest but growing capabilities.

The Second Artillery deploys about 50 CSS-1 Tong Feng medium-range ballistic missiles with an estimated range of 1800 kilometers and an explosive impact of 15 kilotons. These are supplemented by about 85 CSS-2 intermediate-range ballistic missiles with an estimated range of 2500 kilometers and in impact of one to three megatons. Four intercontinental ballistic missiles with a range of approximately 7000 kilometers and an impact of one to three megatons, coupled with a few true ICBMs with an estimated range of 13,000 kilometers and an impact of five to ten megatons, make up the strategic nuclear inventory of the PRC.

The PLA is believed to possess a stockpile of several hundred fission and fusion nuclear devices that are available for drops by tactical fighter and bomber aircraft. The air force has about 100 Tupelov-16 (Badger) medium bombers in inventory—with an operational radius of about 3000 kilometers—that could be used for nuclear weapon delivery. Some fighter aircraft are configured for tactical battlefield delivery.

In substance, the military capabilities of the People's Republic of China are not negligible. Like all capabilities, however, the measure of the PLA can only be assessed against the security threats with which it must contend.

THE SECURITY ENVIRONMENT

At the moment, the security environment of the PRC is dominated by the presence of substantial military forces along the Sino-Soviet border.[3] About 25 percent of the conventional forces of the Soviet Union are deployed along the frontiers of communist China. About 38 motorized rifle divisions are in position, supported by about seven armored and two airborne divisions. About 25 of those divisions are deployed in the Soviet Far East Military District, which borders Manchuria. In manpower, they are roughly equivalent to the PLA forces across the border. They are distinct insofar as they are completely motorized, and the concentration of armor is far heavier than that of the PLA. Overall, along the entire border, communist Chinese troops outnumber Soviet forces at a ratio of about two to one.

Estimates of Soviet air power along the communist Chinese border differ, but the force deployed is probably between 1500 and 2500 combat aircraft, and the types of aircraft vary, providing the Soviet ground forces with support by a large and flexible force. Soviet Far Eastern Frontal Aviation, integrated closely with the forward-deployed ground forces, has been extensively modernized, with the MiG-21s becoming the most numerous fighter-interceptors on station, supplemented by MiG-23s and most recently by MiG-25 (capable of Mach 3 speeds at high altitude), MiG-27s, and the most sophisticated ground attack aircraft in the Soviet air force, the Su-19.

At present, one-fourth of the total force of Soviet Long Range Aviation is assigned targets in the PRC. The most recent addition to Soviet Long Range Aviation in East Asia is the Tu-26 Backfire, which significatly enhances the Soviet air command's capabilities with regard to ordnance-carrying, delivery, range, and survivability.

At sea, the Soviet Far East Fleet deploys a force of about 78 major surface combatants—including at least one aircraft carrier, 11 cruisers, 25 destroyers, and 41 frigates, all missile-capable—supported by 700 lesser vessels. Most of the surface combatants have extensive antisubmarine equipment aboard, and Soviet naval aviation attached to the Far East Fleet operates about 200 to 250 antisubmarine aircraft and helicopters.

Other than the surface vessels, the Soviet Far East Fleet operates about 100 submarines, 25 of which are ballistic-missile boats (about 20 of which are nuclear-powered). Almost half of the remaining submarines are nuclear-powered attack boats, and almost half that number are equipped to launch antiship guided missiles. The five or six Charlie class submarines that make up part of the cruise missile force can launch their antiship cruise missiles while submerged. The remaining Echo II cruise-missile-capable submarines launch their missiles on the surface.

About 15 of the remaining nuclear-powered attack boats are configured for a sub-killing role. Victor I, November, and Echo I class boats are armed with anti-submarine torpedoes. Most of the remaining attack submarines are conventional diesel-powered boats and are used for coastal patrol duties and training exercises.

The conventional forces of the Soviet Union are supplemented by a vast nuclear armory. It is estimated that the Soviet Union maintains about 1600 ICBM silos augmented by almost 1000 launchers aboard submarines. How many of these submarine-launched ballistic missiles are targeted on the PRC is unknown, but at least 30 percent of all Soviet strategic missiles are deployed along the Trans-Siberian railway and in nuclear-powered missile-launching submarines assigned to Pacific waters. SS-18 missiles are emplaced outside Novosibirsk, and SS-4, SS-11, and the newest SS-20 intermediate-range ballistic missiles are deployed in the Trans-Baikal and Siberian Military Districts. These sites can deliver about 8000 nuclear warheads on communist Chinese targets anywhere on the mainland of China. Tactical delivery can be effected by Frog-7 nuclear rockets, providing significant theater nuclear capabilities to Soviet Far Eastern forces.

Given the targeting precision of Soviet nuclear weaponry, it is estimated that less than half of the current Soviet inventory targeted on PRC objectives would be required effectively to destroy all "hard" targets and all selected "soft" objectives. The hard targets would include substantially all PLA launch sites, not excluding those burrowed into mountainsides. Communist Chinese hardening technology, designed to resist nuclear blast effects, is significantly behind that of the West and particularly inferior to that of the Soviet Union. PLA fixed silos have been hardened to about 600 pounds per square inch (psi) overpressure, as opposed to about 1000 psi for those of the United States and 4000 psi for those of the Soviet Union. Similar disabilities afflict other hardened targets housing the military command, control, and communications infrastructure. As a consequence, almost all these targets would be destroyed in a Soviet nuclear attack.

Soft targets would include the 150 communist Chinese airfields capable of servicing jet aircraft. Many of the remaining 450 airfields also might well be targeted and destroyed. Major industrial centers, railheads, and communication hubs would be similarly selected for early destruction, further reducing the PRC's already fragile logistical and communications infrastructure.

It is clear that should the Soviet Union decide on frontal conflict with communist China, a nuclear first strike would constitute a real option. Soviet military manuals insist that in the event of war, "The actions of the troops on the battlefield [would be] coordinated first of all with . . . nuclear strikes and . . . directed toward the exploitation of their results. Nuclear strikes, the destruction of enemy means of nuclear attack, and swift, highly maneuverable actions with the exploitation of gaps, breaches, and intervals in the enemy combat formation form the basis of attack." "Surprise" would be decisive.[4]

Should such an attack be undertaken, it is doubtful that any of the PLA's retaliatory nuclear force would survive.[5] But even if some of the silos and the available missiles of the PLA did survive, there is grave suspicion that they would have little, if any, military value. In the first place, the PRC's nuclear deterrent system is more than two decades old, and all its known ICBMs are liquid-fueled. Although a recent space satellite launch suggests that the PRC has developed solid-fuel technology for its rocket engines,[6] its nuclear delivery systems remain liquid-fueled and will remain so for some time to come.

Liquid-fueled missile systems require a relatively long lead time in launch preparation, making them particularly vulnerable. It is reported, for example, that the PRC's CSS-2 missiles require 48 hours of firing preparation before launch.[7] Moreover, the guidance systems on such vehicles are extremely sensitive and tend to degrade without constant and proper maintenance. Given the shortfall in skilled PLA personnel and the time such delivery systems have been in storage, it is probable that errors and malfunctions would preclude effective launch of a substantial number of the missiles. Those considerations, coupled with the facts that the PLA lacks testing experience and possesses few means of effective target acquisition, suggest that any missiles that might survive Soviet attack to achieve launch would not, in fact, reach their targets.

While the PLA has a small but operational photointelligence capability, the inaccuracy of target data, the questionable target acquisition capabilities, and the primitive guidance properties of the delivery system do not afford Chinese missiles much precision in terms of impact area. The "circular error probable" of PLA missiles is four kilometers—which means that only 50 percent of arriving warheads can be expected to fall within a target circle having a radius as large as four kilometers, making such strikes largely ineffective against any hardened Soviet targets. The comparable figure for Soviet and American missiles is 9.5 kilometers.

Recently, the PRC successfully placed three experimental satellites in orbit at one launching,[8] suggesting that the Chinese have the potential for developing a multiple independent reentry vehicle (MIRV) program that could be employed with nuclear delivery systems. MIRVing its missiles might be a partial answer to the inaccuracy of PLA targeting. Nonetheless, it will be some considerable time before the PLA can deploy MIRVed missiles in sufficient number to alter appreciably the present military balance along the Sino-Soviet border.

Smaller PRC nuclear devices, used for tactical strikes, would seem to be of equally little value in any anti-Soviet conflict scenario. If the PLA has significant targeting problems with strategic nuclear missiles, the precision of guidance systems becomes increasingly critical as the size of the target and the yield of the warhead decrease. Given their guidance problems, Chinese tactical nuclear weapons could only be used with any effectiveness against massed troops and materiel rather than opposing launch sites. The problem with such use turns on the fact that the Soviet Union possesses such an overwhelming advantage in numbers and delivery capabilities for tactical nuclear weaponry than any PLA recourse to their use that would not preempt Soviet response would be suicidal.

Finally, for an effective use of any of their nuclear weapons, the PLA would have to insure the survival of its communications, control, guidance, and intelligence systems, something that would be very difficult to accomplish. The Soviet Union possesses one of the most, if not the most, sophisticated electronic warfare systems in the world—one fully capable of rapidly degrading such PRC capabilities.

Under such circumstances, all that would remain to the strategic forces of communist China would be aircraft delivery of nuclear devices. Obsolescent PLA aircraft would have to penetrate Soviet air defenses to effect delivery. The chances of success against some of the world's most sophisticated interceptors and ground defense systems would be marginal at best. The best communist Chinese option would be a massive launch of aircraft carrying a large number of nuclear weapons, flying at low level to evade early radar detection and tracking. But the airfields capable of servicing such a force would be among the first targets of Soviet attack. As a consequence, the proposed air fleet would have to be dispatched from surviving airfields in the communist Chinese interior—a circumstance that would allow Soviet intelligence a longer lead time for detection and the preparation of countermeasures. The result would be the near certainty of the total destruction of such a force before a meaningful Soviet target could be destroyed.

Given the Soviet advantages in early warning surveillance, electronic warfare capabilities, surface-to-air missilery, conventional air defense, and interceptor aircraft, any PRC response to a Soviet nuclear attack would have negligible effect on the course of the conflict. In fact, the Soviet Union enjoys so many advantages in any nuclear exchange, whether strategic or tactical, that the Soviet military would probably welcome nuclear first use by the PLA. Given the long lead time necessary for the launch of PLA liquid-fueled vehicles, as well as the doubtful targeting and low probability of delivery that would accompany the attack by a small number of devices, the Soviet military would have ample lead time for countermeasures. Moreover, they would then have every justification for destroying all PLA forces in the forward deployment areas without the political and diplomatic opprobrium that would attend Soviet first use.[9]

In the effort to offset the Soviet nuclear advantage, the PRC has continued to pursue development of a submarine-launched missile. In October 1982 it was reported that an SLBM was successfully test-fired by China's navy from Bo Hai Bay to impact in the waters 1600 kilometers northeast of Taiwan. The submarine-launched missile apparently has the range of the American Polaris A-1.

The platform from which the missile was launched has not been determined. It may have been either a modified Han class nuclear-powered boat or a Golf class diesel-powered submarine. In any event, the Chinese navy has very few such platforms, either nuclear or traditionally powered, and it is unlikely that any such vessels will be dispatched to patrol duty any distance from mainland Chinese bases. It would be impossible to come to the assistance of any such vessels should there be an emergency, given the limited blue-water capabilities of the naval forces of the PRC.

Only when China's navy has a minimum of four to six such submarine missile platforms, supported by open-water servicing and assistance capabilities, could such submarine-launched ballistic missiles contribute to the nuclear deterrent capabilities of the communist Chinese armed forces. Until that time, the strategic capabilities of the PRC will contribute little to the strategic nuclear balance. That the United States would devote the substantial sums of money, or the advanced technology, necessary to enhance Beijing's nuclear capabilities is very unlikely.

For the foreseeable future the PLA does not pose a serious nuclear threat to the Soviet Union, and little of the Soviet Union's nuclear capability is employed in covering PRC targets. In fact, it appears that the proportion of the Soviet nuclear arsenal needed to counter the PLA nuclear threat is smaller today than it was a decade ago. Soviet nuclear delivery technology has improved with such rapidity that a counterforce strike against the nuclear potential of the PLA would today involve only a negligible part of Soviet capabilities.

At the time of the normalization of diplomatic relations between the PRC and the United States, some suggested that the strategic forces of the PLA would be rapidly improved to the point where they would have a disabling effect on Soviet strategic planning; such suggestions are now recognized to have been totally unrealistic. Against either of the superpowers, the mainland Chinese could not, under any forseeable circumstances, put together a survivable land-based nuclear deterrent during the present century. Eventually, the submarine-based ICBMs of the navy could serve as a second-strike threat, but it will probably be decades before mainland China has the technology, the number of platforms, and the blue-water capabilities to provide a minimum deterrent capability against the Soviet nuclear threat.[10] The costs involved will be heavy and will strain current skilled manpower resources. Such efforts will, of course, affect the attempt to modernize the PRC's retarded economic system.[11] Finally, it is obvious that the military systems of the Soviet Union will continue to evolve, and its present antisubmarine capabilities, for example, which are formidable, will improve still further. The PRC may never be able to put together a survivable submarine nuclear deterrent. It seems reasonably clear that the People's Republic of China, for at least the determinate future, offers little in the way of military advantage to the West in terms of its strategic capabilities, and there seems to be very little the West can do, realistically, to alter that fact.

If one considers alternative nonconventional arms such as chemical weapons, the prospects are no less bleak. The Soviet Union possesses overwhelming advantages vis-a-vis the PRC. Soviet commanders have been trained to consider such weapon employments as a matter of course in any conflict, conditional upon tactical and meteorological opportunities.

With the accompanying array of multiple rocket launchers and aircraft for the rapid delivery of persistent and nonpersistent chemical agents such as cyanide or sarin, the large stocks of toxic substances available to the Soviet ground forces would provide the USSR with major battlefield advantages. All reconnaissance units in the Soviet ground forces have components equipped for duty in chemically contaminated areas. Decontamination sprays are held at the company level and above, and every division has complex mass decontamination equipment in inventory.

The evidence from Laos and Cambodia suggests that the Soviet Union (at least through its surrogates) is prepared to use chemical toxins in conflicts. Similar reports have surfaced concerning the use of such toxins in Yemen in the 1960s. Should they be used against the PLA, there is every evidence that the armed forces of the PRC are ill-equipped to counter or neutralize their effects.

If such are the circumstances when one considers the nonconventional capabilities of the USSR, any assessment of the conventional capabilities available for use by the Soviets against the PRC would afford little occasion for optimism in Beijing. In the threat environment in which the PLA would be forced to operate, there is little to suggest that its vast armies of foot soldiers would offer anything more than cannon fodder for Soviet fire in the course of frontal conflict.

CONVENTIONAL GROUND AND AIR FORCES

Given the present configuration of forces along the Sino-Soviet border, the Soviet Union—even without recourse to non-conventional modes of attack—has an entire repertoire of military options it could exercise with a more-than-reasonable chance of success. Should the Soviet Union undertake attack across the borders of the PRC, the open spaces and the thin population of Sinkiang and Inner Mongolia offer optimum terrain for rapid armored and motorized infantry assaults. Such a campaign would be supported by air strikes against strong points and air cover for ground troops.

The communications system from central China to Sinkiang is very fragile, with major transport threaded through a single rail connection that traverses the Kansu corridor. Sinkiang is a vast arid region, ringed by mountains, which in large measure is similar to the desert reaches of the Middle East. The topography and the thin communications infrastructure make the region susceptible to classic desert warfare maneuvers. Severance of the rail connections through the Kansu corridor would make regeneration of the PLA ground forces extremely difficult, and the Soviet conjoint employment of air supremacy, armored mobility, and mobile firepower would make the entire region all but indefensible.

Soviet aircraft employed in any such attack would have machine and trained-manpower advantages over the obsolescent aircraft of China's air force. The bulk of the communist Chinese air force is still composed of MiG-17s and MiG-19s—both of 30-year/old designs. The small number of Chinese MiG-21s in service appear to suffer from design impairments and are of doubtful combat usefulness. PRC aircraft possess primitive avionics and navigational capabilities and generally lack effective air-to-air attack radar. At present the three known types of air-to-air missiles carried on PLA aircraft are relatively modern, comparable to the Aim-9B Sidewinder of the US Air Force. How many of the aircraft of China's air force are so equipped, however, is difficult to determine—with the armaments industry of the PRC having commenced series production only in 1982.[12] Against the MiG-23s, MiG-25s, and MiG-27s in service with Soviet Far Eastern Frontal Aviation, it is doubtful that China's air force could long survive.[13]

An effective air defense of the PLA forces is further impaired by the fact that Chinese aircraft, given their obsolescence and the lack of skilled manpower in the PRC military, seem to suffer greater maintenance problems, and consequently suffer more downtime, than aircraft in other air services. The propulsion systems of PLA MiGs, for example, require overhaul after only a hundred hours of flying time, while the F-4s in inventory with Western air forces remain in operation without such major servicing ten times as long. Moreover, supplies of aircraft parts are limited and their delivery is unreliable. Finally, the training of PRC pilots seems singularly inadequate, with less than 100 annual flight hours per pilot scheduled as the norm as late as 1978.[14]

In a combat situation, the pilots of China's air force could expect only limited ground intelligence and control assistance. The communist Chinese radar system is notoriously thin. There have been some suggestions of a current attempt at upgrading, but for the time being the system appears to have a very limited capacity for detecting low-flying aircraft. Soviet attack aircraft making entry into PRC airspace under 5000 feet would arrive on target virtually undetected. Chinese pilots would have literally no early warning time. Once they did engage in combat, the lack of onboard electronic countermeasures to deflect Soviet air-to-air missiles, launched from outside the range of Chinese fire, would rapidly erode the numbers of aircraft available for the continued defense on the homeland.

Chinese aircraft surviving such encounters and attempting to attack Soviet ground formations would have to contend with one of the most formidable antiaircraft environments of modern times. Surface-to-air missiles launched from Soviet SA-2, SA-6, and SA-9 sites would constitute grave threats to the survival of attacking aircraft. The SA-6 Gainful SAM was employed in the Arab-Israeli war of 1973 and scored some notable successes against the most formidable of the Israeli air units. A fully mobile missile, equipped with sophisticated fire control features including an inflight guidance adjustment capability over the missile-borne semi-active homing system, the SA-6 has a 60-kilometer high altitude range, a 30-kilometer low altitude range, and a high first-shot kill probability. Supplemented by the short-range SA-9 Gaskin and about 10,000 radar-controlled antiaircraft weapons, the air defenses of any Soviet invasion force would be all but impenetrable to China's air force. In the judgment of Western analysts, "The Chinese air force is likely to prove almost completely ineffective against any concerted air defense." Worse still, it is "unlikely that China's air force could successfully protect the PLA from attack and interdiction [from Soviet aircraft]."[15]

With assured air superiority along the entire northern borders of the People's Republic of China, the Soviet forces would use their superiority in armor and mobility to maximum advantage. At the present time Soviet forces enjoy about a three-to-one superiority in tanks and a ten-to-one superiority in armored fighting vehicles and personnel carriers. If calculation is made for qualitative superiority, the differences are even more disheartening.

The Soviet Union has deployed some of its most advanced armor along the communist Chinese border. Soviet T-64/T-72 main battle tanks have been entered into service in Asia. Protected with special laminate armor and armed with smooth-bore 125mm guns, the Soviet tanks outclass the best that the PLA can marshal in opposition. The PLA's present main battle tank, the T-59, is a copy of an obsolescent Soviet T-54 that had been supplied to the PRC by the USSR in the late 1950s and early 1960s. The T-59 is armed with a 100mm gun, but without the power traverse, stabilization of the main weapon, or infrared sighting devices that were standard on the original Soviet models. The gunner and the loader use hand traverse mechanisms which significantly reduce the rate of engagement and compound the difficulties of fire from anything but a flat position. In an open field engagement, where first-hit capability is critically important, such impairment would significantly reduce the survivability of the equipment.[16] In open terrain, characteristic of large expanses of Sinkiang and Inner Mongolia, such armor would have little chance against technologically and numerically superior Soviet tanks. The Soviet T-72, firing armor-piercing, fin-stabilized rounds, could easily breach the shielding of the PLA main battle tanks from stand-off positions beyond the maximum range of the communist Chinese onboard weapons.[17]

Recently there have been reports of a new PRC battle tank, the Type 69 MBT, which incorporates some advanced technological features. The T-69 employs the same chassis and turret as the T-59 but has incorporated a weapon platform stabilizer, a 105mm smooth-bore main weapon, an automatic laser range finder, and an infrared night light, all of which are calculated to improve the combat effectiveness of PLA armor. It will be some considerable time before the PLA can replace the older T-59s with the more modern T-69s, however, and even then its armor will remain inferior quantitatively and qualitatively to current Soviet tank formations. Given the continued improvement of the Soviet inventory, the PRC's efforts, at best, will only marginally improve the PRC's position. Exposed to Soviet air strikes and antitank helicopter gunships, the armor of the PLA would suffer grievous attrition rates.

The difficulties the PLA would experience in attempting to contain Soviet armored thrusts would be compounded by the critical shortfall in antitank weaponry that currently afflicts communist China's armed forces. Present PLA inventory includes largely outdated and ineffective antitank grenade launchers and recoilless rifles—whose limited range and lethality preclude any significant defense against Soviet armor.

The Type 56 antitank grenade launcher, with which PLA units are amply supplied, has a maximum range of 160 yards. Soviet tank crews would have to be singularly inept to allow antitank teams to make so close an approach in open country. In cluttered terrain, such weapons might have some effect, although the current series of Soviet main battle tanks are heavily armored and it is doubtful that such weapons could inflict significant damage. The D-44 85mm antitank gun and the 75mm recoilless rifle in service with the PLA are ineffective except at murderously short range, exposing antitank teams to heavy suppression fire, and even then the shielding of the Soviet main battle tanks would probably defeat them.[18] There are some reports of PRC copies of the Soviet Sagger antitank guided missile having entered PLA service in 1978 or 1979, but the copies are apparently much more primitive than the Soviet original and of dubious effectiveness.[19]

In effect, the PLA has little in inventory that could stop a Soviet armored invasion across the extended Sino-Soviet border. Even below the threshold of nuclear exchange, the communist Chinese forces are outclassed by Soviet forces. Bereft of the hope of air support, outgunned and outmaneuvered by mobile forces, and armed with obsolete weapons of minimal effectiveness, the foot soldiers of the PLA would be decimated in any frontal engagements. Any attempt to employ the human wave attacks that proved so costly in Korea would result in a grotesque casualty rate against an aggressor that can lay down about five million pounds of ordnance on a battlefield in 30 minutes.

Any fallback to "people's war" tactics would be all but impossible given the relatively thin population concentrations in Sinkiang and Mongolia. Only in Manchuria might the irregular warfare of classical Maoist military doctrine make secure occupation more difficult. But it is clear that the Japanese managed to pacify Manchuria in the late 1930s and early 1940s, and there is little reason to believe that the Soviet Union could not accomplish as much.

It seems evident that the thin transport and communications infrastructure of contemporary communist China could not support a modern conflict on its own soil. Transport and communications remain major weaknesses of the PLA. With about one million trucks in service on about 900,000 kilometers of roads, and with the extant rail services on 50,000 kilometers of track, it is doubtful that the General Rear Services Department, responsible for the logistics of the PLA armed forces, could sustain the large-scale mechanized infantry, tank, and artillery formations required to engage an enemy in modern warfare, or provide transport and supplies for the care of casualties and the replenishment of front-line elements.

During the recent "punitive" invasion of the Socialist Republic of Vietnam by the PRC, the periodic lulls in the activities of the PLA strongly suggest that communist China's armed forces had considerable difficulty in maintaining a steady flow of supplies to forward elements. It seems clear that the transport infrastructure of southern China was overloaded by the demands of the three-week conflict in Southeast Asia.

While the Soviet Union would have logistical problems of its own in any conflict along the Sino-Soviet border, it seems apparent that it possesses the requisite supply capabilities to sustain such engagements. In 1945, the Soviet army overwhelmed the Japanese Kwantung Army in Manchuria in a lightning armored attack that averaged a 50-kilometer daily advance. At that time, the Soviet Union had transported a combat-ready force of about 750,000 troops across Siberia in about four months to launch an armored blitzkrieg into Manchuria. Today the Soviet Union has vastly improved capabilities—and while it is clear that the effort would be burdensome, it seems equally evident that the transport, maintenance, and resupply, required for the campaign could be provided. Rail, sea, and airlift capabilities of the present Soviet military are sufficiently robust to afford such a venture the promise of success.

PRC NAVAL FORCES

Finally, under any conceivable set of military circumstances, it is difficult to imagine that the navy of the PRC could in any way alter the outcome of events. Communist China's navy is essentially a coastal defense force, and although its fleet of about 100 attack submarines is large by world standards, the fact that all its underwater crafts are Soviet-designed and diesel-powered, and relatively short-ranged, render them ready targets for the sophisticated antisubmarine capabilities of the Soviet navy.

Chinese submarines could possibly cause some episodic interruption in the seaborne flow of supplies to the Soviet armies in East Asia, but it is doubtful that they could have decisive effect. The PLA navy, as has been suggested, has had very little blue-water sailing experience. Chinese submarine crews have never been known to venture outside the immediate coastal waters of mainland China. Both the Romeo and Whiskey class boats of the Chinese submarine service (which in the Soviet navy serve only as training vessels at the present time) are familiar to Soviet crews, are noisy, have limited range and endurance, and are slow once submarged. All of those drawbacks make them poor candidates for sealane interdiction in any effort to undermine Soviet supply lines in time of conflict.

The submarines of China's navy are ideally suited for shallow-water coastal defense operations where none of those shortcomings would be totally disabling.[20] Moreover, in coastal waters, land-based aircraft could provide at least nominal protection against Soviet antisubmarine measures. In fact, in times of conflict, it would be unlikely that the navy of the PRC would attempt to extend itself outside the range of land-based air cover. Without air cover the vessels would be at grave risk against the multiple air, submarine, and surface weapon systems of the modern Soviet fleet. The combatants of China's navy have virtually no air defense capabilities. An attempt was apparently made to put an antiaircraft surface-to-air missile system aboard the Kiangtung class frigates of the Chinese navy, but the retrofitting was abandoned. More recently, the PRC embarked upon negotiations with Great Britain's Aerospace Dynamics and Vosper Thornycroft to arm eight of its Luta class destroyers and some of its frigates with the Sea Dart surface-to-air missile system and electronic countermeasures capable of deflecting incoming missiles, but the order was canceled in early 1983, apparently because of a shortfall in foreign exchange.[21]

As far as is known, the Chinese navy has no operational seaborne defense SAMS, and the machine guns and conventional antiaircraft weaponry on shipboard would be of marginal use against supersonic and high subsonic air attacks.

China's navy is fully capable of providing substantial coastal defense, but it is very unlikely that the Soviet Union would attempt coastal amphibious assaults or attacks against the shore except as diversionary feints. Whatever the case, in any engagements with Soviet combatants, the vessels of China's navy would be seriously disadvantaged. The only shipboard antiship missile system on PRC units is the communist Chinese version of the Soviet SS-N-2 Styx, with a range estimated to be about 20 nautical miles. These might well be opposed by the Soviet SS-N-3 antiship Shaddock missiles, with a range of about 150 to 250 nautical miles, that operate from Kresta class cruisers in service with the Soviet Far East Fleet. Of the approximately 100 boats in the Soviet submarine fleet, about 20 can launch standoff antiship cruise missiles of various range capabilities. The Charlie class submarines can launch SS-N-7 missiles with a range of about 30 nautical miles while submerged. The Echo-II class boats can launch the SS-N-3 Shaddock while surfaced.

These vessels are supplemented by Soviet naval aviation that deploys about 85 Tu-16 Badger medium-range bombers that are antiship missile capable. As a strike aircraft the Badger can carry two antiship AS-5 Kelt cruise missiles with a range of about 85 nautical miles, or one AS-2 Kipper with a range of about 115 nautical miles. In turn, these are augmented by a variety of antisubmarine aircraft, including about 150 antisubmarine helicopters, some of which operate from Soviet surface vessels. Of the latter, the KA-25 Hormone is standard for carrier use. Equipped with search radar, dunking sonar, and a towed magnetic anomaly detector array, the Hormone, with relative ease, can search out, identify, and track the noisy underwater boats in service with the Chinese navy. In conjunction with the Krivak class antisubmarine destroyers operative with the Soviet Far East Fleet, they consitute critical threats to the survival of PRC submarines outside immediate coastal waters.

The large fleet of fast attack craft available to the Chinese navy, once again, is suitable for coastal defense, but offers little threat to Soviet sea lanes. These vessels would be of little offensive use outside the range of land-based aircraft because of their vulnerability. The Hola and Komar/Hoku missile-capable fast attack craft make poor launching platforms in rough seas in any case—and the open-ended launchers of the Komars make their onboard missiles susceptible to corrosion by open ocean spray. Finally, all the missile-capable Chinese fast attack craft employ Styx missiles with a short range and radio-controlled guidance systems that can be easily jammed by electronic countermeasures. The Israelis used such jamming procedures and succeeded in decimating the similar missile boats of the Egyptian navy in the Yom Kippur War.

The Soviet Union has been gradually phasing out its Komar fast attack craft and replacing them with larger and more sophisticated Nanuchka boats, armed with the SS-N-9 missile with a normal operating range of at least 50 nautical miles and a reputed maximum range of 170 nautical miles. Unless Chinese fast attack craft could overwhelm the electronic countermeasure system onboard Soviet naval vessels from dangerously close range, they could inflict little damage on Soviet naval capabilities in any conflict in the open sea.

CONCLUSIONS

However one considers the military capabilities of the PRC in any threat environment involving the Soviet Union, its disabilities are formidable. All the armed services of the PLA suffer from materiel, weapon system, and combat unit obsolesence. The infrastructural support systems in almost every respect are insufficient to sustain modern warfare. The lack of skilled manpower makes maintenance and research and development extremely difficult.

While the Soviet Union has an entire range of options it might successfully pursue, including strategic and tactical nuclear strikes against mainland China, the most plausible military operations would probably include active support, at a variety of gradually escalating levels, for "national liberation" uprisings in Sinkiang, Inner Mongolia, or Manchuria. This might include anything from providing military supplies and sanctuary for insurgents to launching a lightning armored invasion of the border regions to whatever depth chosen. Such activities could be either punitive or designed to afford the Soviet Union bargaining advantage.

All the advantages would accrue to Soviet forces. In much of the region the population is sparce and communications systems very thin. Any suggestions of "people's warfare" under such circumstances would not be feasible. Given the mobility and firepower of Soviet forces, the Chinese defense would have little chance of success. Space would have to be traded for time, and in a region like Manchuria, where Chinese industry and resources are concentrated, such a strategy would be fatal. The People's Republic of China would lose half its confirmed oil resources, a third of its steelmaking capability, and about half of its motor vehicle industrial plants. In effect, the notion that the Chinese at their present stage of development could stop or effectively threaten thereafter a Soviet occupation of Sinkiang and Northeast Manchuria by mass manpower is ingenuous. Climate, terrain, superior Soviet mobility, Soviet air supremacy, and, above all, Soviet nuclear and chemical weaponry preclude any such defense by China as long as the present military equation continues.[22]

It has become increasingly clear that the military capabilities of the People's Republic of China offer little that might serve as a counterweight to overall Soviet military advantages. In general, most military analysts are prepared to recognize that "the range of Soviet strategic options regarding China is sufficiently robust to demonstrate that Western nations would be ill-advised to put too many hopes in the deterrent capacity of the Chinese in the years ahead." [23]

In substance there is little that the PRC could directly contribute to the military security of the West. In a general conflict the Soviet Union could withdraw troops from the Sino-Soviet border without fear of attack. There is every reason to believe that the communist Chinese would not involve themselves in the conflict unless directly subject to attack. But even were they disposed to attack, there is no way that the PLA could sustain operations outside the borders of China. Against a modern military power, the Chinese military is manifestly and necessarily a defensive force. Whatever offensive capabilities it possesses could not be used to any effect against Soviet defenses.

If mainland China were attacked by the Soviet Union, it is doubtful that the United States, or the West in general, would or could intervene effectively. Any effort to replenish the losses that would be suffered by the PLA would be all but hopeless and would involve astronomical costs. Neither western inventory nor productive capabilities could provide the mass of weaponry and supplies that would be required to replenish or rehabilitate PLA combat units mauled by superior Soviet forces.

Current American capabilities in these respects are so limited that when the United States found itself compelled to replenish Israeli stocks during the brief Yom Kippur War of 1973, the military command was forced to draw off supplies and weapons, in some cases, from mainline units in the NATO command. That the United States, or the West in general, could restore the integrity of the PLA after Soviet attack by rapid resupply without jeopardizing its own security is unrealistic.

The West, as a consequence, enjoys precious little military profit from its Chinese connection. Substantial Soviet forces will probably remain in East Asia whatever the relationship between communist China and the West, and whatever the measure of rapprochement between communist China and the Soviet Union. The past history of relations between the two communist powers would seem effectively to preclude a drawing down of Soviet forces to the low levels of the 1950s even if the level of mutual hostility between the PRC and the USSR is maximally reduced. Too many current and future Soviet assets are to be found in the eastern territories to imagine that adequate defense of the region will not be maintained.[24]

Soviet force deployments at the present time appear sufficient to counter any Western or Chinese moves—with a strategic reserve that allows Soviet initiatives in southwest Asia and the Persian Gulf. In the military game between superpowers, the People's Republic of China is an "unarmed giant," incapable of undertaking initiatives against the Soviet Union or adequately defending itself against those by the Soviet Union.[25] It is unlikely that the PRC would come to the assistance of the West in any general conflict, and any effort by the West to come to its aid in the event of Soviet attack would undermine Western security without offsetting communist Chinese disabilities.

Several years ago it was estimated that it would require anywhere from $41 billion to $63 billion to upgrade the armed forces of the PRC to a "confident capability" that would allow it to deter Soviet attack.[26] Today, given the escalation in military costs, that estimate could be well over $100 billion. In two of the past three years Beijing's military budget declined about 13 percent per annum; only in 1982 did it increase, and then a meager six percent.[27] At the moment, defense is one of the lowest items on the list of priorities for the communist Chinese developmental program.

Beijing has made a few arms-related purchases from the Western powers in the recent past. Some years ago the PRC purchased coproduction rights for domestic manufacture of the British RB.168-25R Spey MK 202 turbofan engine. But credible reports indicate that the mainland Chinese have not been able to undertake local production of the engine, and that there has been a forced cessation of manufacture and the delay or abandonment of indigenous development of an advanced fighter for the Chinese air force.

In January 1983 the PRC ordered a Landsat ground station and data processing equipment from the Systems and Applied Sciences Corporation in the United States.[28] The $10 to $20 million purchase was calculated to improve the PLA's surveillance and target acquisition capabilities. How successful the technicians of the PLA will be in incorporating these elements in the present system is difficult to determine, however, given the industrial and technological handicaps with which they must work.

Beijing has sent representatives shopping for advanced weapon systems in the West, and they have evinced interest in the British Harrier jump-jet, the British Sea Dart SAM's, the French Exocet surface-to-surface missiles, and the Dassault-Breuguet Mirage 2000 fighters. To date none of these inquiries has matured into purchase and transfer. The PRC appears loathe to pay the price for the very expensive Western weapon systems, may not be able to absorb such systems into its rather primitive military system, and would rather purchase a few samples of any weapon systems and undertake licensed indigenous production (something it will not be able to accomplish for some considerable time).

In effect, it appears very unlikely that the present military balance along the Sino-Soviet border will change appreciably to the benefit of the PRC for the foreseeable future. Given this circumstance, it is difficult to understand in what sense the People's Republic of China presently constitutes a direct security or military asset to the anit-Soviet West.[29] Continued normal relations between the United States and the People's Republic of China may afford some diplomatic, political, and economic benefits—and friendly relations between any two countries are always to be preferred to hostility. But it seems reasonably clear that whatever benefits the relations between the United States and the PRC might deliver, direct strategic and military payoffs are not among them.

NEW MILFORD JEWISH CENTER HONORS JULIA AND GEORGE HERMANN

● Mr. LAUTENBERG. Mr. President, on April 28, 1984, the Beth Tikvah New Milford Jewish Center in New Milford, NJ, will be honoring Julia and George Hermann for their long and dedicated service to the New Milford Jewish Center and the whole Jewish community.

Mr. and Mrs. Hermann joined the New Milford Jewish Center when they settled in New Milford in 1960. Soon they were involved in almost every aspect of its operation. Mr. Hermann has served as president of the men's club of the congregation, and has held many positions on the board of directors. He is a member of the board of governors, and continues to give his advice, energy, and time to the congregation.

Mrs. Hermann was elected president of the sisterhood of the center, has held almost every chairmanship of the board of directors, and continues to serve on the board.

Mr. and Mrs. Hermann have served as cochairpersons for many events, including the Israel Bond Drive and Journal Testimonial Dinner Dances. The Hermanns were honored by the State of Israel for their work in the Israel Bond Drive.

In addition to their hard work at the New Milford Center, the Hermanns have served the entire Jewish community. Mr. Hermann is a member of the Zionist Organization of America, PSI Delta Phi Fraternity, the United Jewish Community Fund, and is president of the Freedom Benevolent Society.

The Hermanns continue to pass on the traditions of Judaism. They have taken their grandchildren to Israel in order to teach them about their Jewish heritage.

We in New Jersey are very proud to have such citizens as Julia and George Hermann, whose service and dedication has enhanced the lives of the members of the Beth Tikvah New Milford Jewish Center, and the entire Jewish community.●

ARDMORE, OK, NAMED ALL AMERICAN CITY

● Mr. NICKLES. Mr. President, I am very proud to share with my colleagues that the city of Ardmore, OK, has been today named an All American City by the Citizens Forum on Self Government and the National Municipal League. While it has never been a secret to Oklahomans that Ardmore is one of the nicest places around in which to live, I am pleased that the rest of the country is now being made aware of this fact.

Ardmore and eight other U.S. cities were given this honor because of the involvement of their citizens in the decisionmaking processes, and the subsequent community improvements that have been the result of that. Ardmore has much to show for itself, including a nationally recognized high school, and a new higher education center. The citizens of Ardmore have truly been supportive, committed to, and involved in all aspects of the many changes that have enhanced their community and enriched their lives.

I again wish to state my sincerest congratulations to each and every Ardmoreite, and also extend the good wishes of all my colleagues here today.●

LEBANON BLUNDERS

● Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, it is difficult to know how to evaluate the U.S. role in the Middle East in the wake of the pullout of U.S. marines from Lebanon. At first glance, one might accept the conclusion that the only accomplishment of our policies to date has been to fully compromise any gains toward peace achieved by the successful Israeli actions of driving the PLO out of Lebanon and completely defanging the adventurism of Syria.

What the United States has accomplished, it appears, is to assure the opportunity for reentry of the PLO into Lebanon, as well as to effect an almost miraculous transformation of a fully routed Syria into the preeminent power broker in the region.

It may be possible to adopt a slightly more positive tone in noting that former National Security Adviser, Zbigniew Brzezinski, has stepped forward with a new proposal for Mid-east negotiations; yet it is hard to escape the reality that the only real option now available to our policymakers is to assess the full extent of the damage.

My own damage assessment is not much more than I have already stated. Very simply, we have gone far to help our enemies and to hurt our only real friend in the region. Obviously, my location on this side of the aisle readily invites a charge of partisanship for anything I might say on the subject. Whatever may be the case, the thought has crossed my mind—as well as that of a few others—that the U.S. intervention into Lebanon has been the most self-defeating and wrong-headed U.S. foreign policy action since the Bay of Pigs invasion of the very Democratic Kennedy administration.

If there is anything approaching fairness in that charge, then there are powerfully clear lessons to be acknowledged. We have now tried almost every other alternative, and in view of the result it must the case that our future policy in this region can succeed only when it is marked by a positive and sure-handed relationship with Israel. Nothing has been, or will ever be, gained in following a policy that seeks cooperative response from Arab countries at the expense of Israel. In fact, if there is to be anything approaching cooperation in the region, experience has shown that it comes only in its most grudging form from Arab leaders when the United States has demonstrated its commitment to Israel which at the same time meets our own national security interest. The latter is what leads us to the former.

It is disturbing to me that even in the wake of such serious miscalculation in Lebanon, the Reagan administration has still sent no signal of a change in stance in its Middle East policy. With so many errors of judgment now having brought such damaging results to our own interests in the region, as well as to the basic security of Israel, one would hope for evidence of a revision in thinking.

I point to William Safire at this stage to further unburden myself of some of the onus of partisanship and to further elaborate on the gravity of the errors of this administration. Safire is of course far more closely associated with the party and philosophy which now occupy the White House than my own. He has in some respects served in the role of the loyal opposition on the editorial pages of the New York Times, which itself has heard charges of a certain degree of bias on the subject of Israel.

A recent column by Safire titled, "Lebanon Misconceptions, Blunders Mark Reagan's 'Bay of Pigs'" carries all the more force because of the journalistic role Mr. Safire has carved out. In this commentary of U.S. policy in Lebanon, Safire has called the Reagan administration's actions in Lebanon for what they are, a string of blunders that has saved Lebanon's enemies and undermined one of our closest allies. I submit Mr. Safire's column for the record at this point to further underscore the difficult position this administration has created for itself and our Nation in the Middle East.

The column follows:

[From the New York Times, Mar. 4, 1984]

LEBANON—MISCONCEPTIONS, BLUNDERS MARK REAGAN'S 'BAY OF PIGS'

(By William Safire)

WASHINGTON.—Now that the U.S. Marines have departed Lebanon, mission unaccomplished, let us examine the series of misconceptions and blunders that brought about President Reagan's Bay of Pigs:

Weinberger-Haig-Habib Misconception No. 1: The Soviet-backed Syrian and Palestine Liberation Organization takeover of Lebanon could be rolled back in 1982 by U.S. diplomacy.

After a year's fruitless pleading by our special envoy Philip Habib, Syria refused to remove its Soviet missiles from occupied Lebanon.

After a year's indirect dickering with the United States from its west Beirut sanctuary, the PLO escalated its terrorism by shooting an Israeli diplomat. So much for hopes of talking Syria out of Lebanon and the PLO out of terror.

Clark-Weinberger-Bush Blunder No. 1: Reacting to Israel's strike against the Syrian-PLO occupation of Lebanon as if America's ally Israel, and not Russia's ally Syria, were Lebanon's problem.

Then-Secretary of State Alexander Haig saw clearly in June of 1982 that Israel's military response to the Soviet missiles and the murders ordered from PLO headquarters in Beirut was in the Western interest.

He recommended that we merely disassociate ourselves from the Israeli move, letting them take the brunt of public complaints from Arab "moderates."

But Defense Secretary Caspar Weinberger and William Clark, the inexperienced national security adviser, turned Western strategy on its head and joined the general condemnation of Israel.

With help from Vice President George Bush, they prevailed on Reagan, who was still miffed at Israel for objecting to our sale of AWACS jets to Saudi Arabia, to fire Haig; as a result, Arabist gained complete control of U.S. Mideast policy.

Weinberger-Clark-Shultz Misconception No. 2: If we saved the radical Arab forces from defeat, they would seek compromise rather than total victory in Lebanon.

Israel was surprised to discover that the PLO could not fight in open terrain and that Syria was a paper tiger. After sweeping the area on their northern border that had been used to launch rocket attacks, the Israelis saw an opportunity to finish off the PLO for good. By throwing the Syrians and the PLO out of Lebanon, Israel could make peace with the pro-Western Lebanese Bashir Gemayel, a Christian leader strong enough to permit greater Moslem participation.

But President Reagan was panicked by condemnatory U.S. media coverage of Israeli attacks on the PLO, which had taken west Beirut hostage; commentators denounced "imperial Israel," TV assignment editors demanded anti-war footage, and Reagan's Arabists made their fatal move:

Weinberger-Shultz-Clark Blunder No. 2: U.S. forces were sent to Lebanon to prevent the final defeat of the Soviet-supported radical Arabs.

We negotiated a cease-fire to "save" Beirut. After our troops departed, the Syrian-equipped terrorists murdered Gemayel and his top Christian leadership; then maddened Christian Phalangists slaughtered innocents at the Palestinian camps, and Arab leaders who rarely complained of civilian casualties during years of Lebanon's civil war suddenly called down a firestorm of condemnation on Israel.

The Israelis owned up to their own tragic error of not adequately defending the Palestinians against the Christians infuriated by the murder of Bashir.

Reagan sent in U.S. Marines again as a symbol of American strength and determination to uphold the government of Bashir's weak brother, Amin Gemayel—but we made success impossible by trusting our enemies and savaging our friends.

Habib-Weinberger-Shultz Misconception No. 3: If we pressured Israel to withdraw, the Saudis would arrange for the Syrians to leave Lebanon alone.

Our dean of diplomats, Habib, was double-crossed; after Israel signed the withdrawal pact that Shultz negotiated, the Syrians got the Saudis to tell Gemayel to abrogate it.

Weinberger-Reagan Blunder No. 3: The United States pointedly avoided cooperation with Israeli forces in the area and blindly trusted the judgment of commanders untrained in terrorist war.

The U.S. servicemen who were sacrificed, and those who pulled out, were sent to Lebanon by mistake. The Syrians and their Lebanese fifth column were saved from humiliation by our intervention—and paid their debt by humiliating us.

In the end, we were lobbing shells at Syrian-backed guerrillas shooting at us from behind civilians, which was what horrified our media when the Israelis had to do it in the beginning.

The secretary of State has learned from this farrago of blunder to trust an ally and to deal harshly with a murderous enemy. The secretary of Defense seems to have learned nothing. By saving Lebanon's enemies and undermining our ally in 1982, Reagan snatched defeat from the jaws of victory.●

DR. BENJAMIN ELIJAH MAYS

HON. CHARLES McC. MATHIAS, JR.

OF MARYLAND

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, April 9, 1984

● Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, public life is more than holding public office and its impact may be much greater than the daily chores that it entails. No better illustration of this principle exists than the life of Dr. Benjamin Elijah Mays of Atlanta, GA. His work as the president of a small, predominantly black college and as chairman of a local school board was useful, but his influence on the future, the power of his example, and the force of his teaching were immense. He was a "witness" in the classic sense of that word.

Andrew Young, mayor of Atlanta and former Ambassador to the United Nations, expressed this quality in Dr. Mays when he said:

Dr. Mays talked about the need to create an enormous black leadership in the nation. Thousands of his students are now giving that leadership. Dr. Mays taught them their sense of mission, their sense of direction, their responsibility to "the least of these."

The fact that Dr. Mays was the teacher who inspired Martin Luther King, Jr., is well known. Mayor Young, who knew them both, said:

Dr. King used to say all the time that he awakened intellectually and spiritually listening to Dr. Mays preach in chapel. It was Dr. Mays who started Martin Luther King reading Gandhi.

But Martin Luther King, Jr., was not the only student whose career began as a student of Benjamin Mays and came to national attention. The names of Julian Bond and Maynard Jackson come to mind, but only as representatives of a legion of remarkable citizens who changed a nation.

President Carter called Dr. Mays a monumental figure in the field of education and social progress.

Mrs. Mathias, who has been active in the field of education, has had a enormous respect for him and admiration for his work. I join with her in mourning the death of an American who was successful in making America better for all of us by making it better for the most neglected and oppressed among us.

Dr. Mays was an Atlantan and spent most of his adult life in Georgia, but we in Maryland salute him at his passing because he was a citizen of the world and a brother to us all.

I ask that editorials that appeared in the Atlanta Constitution and the Atlanta Journal may be printed at this point in the RECORD together with an article written by Msgr. Noel C. Burtenshaw for the Atlanta Journal and Constitution.

The editorials follow:

BENJAMIN MAYS: A GIANT IS GONE

Benjamin Elijah Mays was an uncommon man. He will probably be best remembered as the driving force behind Morehouse College's remarkable climb to academic prominence and as the mentor of civil-rights leader Martin Luther King Jr.

But Dr. Mays was even more. In addition to being one of America's foremost educators, he was an author, orator, humanitarian, a man of uncompromised integrity and a sterling example to his own and following generations.

He was an eloquent spokesman for the downtrodden and a man who believed deeply in the dignity and worth of his fellow beings. He was simply a national treasure and we—particularly Atlantans—are all the better because he lived and worked in our midst.

Mays fought his entire life for equality and justice for blacks, and he inspired generations of disadvantaged young people to rise above lowly stations through education and nonviolent political activism. He led by example.

Born to former slaves in a tiny South Carolina town, Mays was 22 years old when he was graduated from high school—but by age 45, he was president of Morehouse College, a position he held for 27 years. At 75, when most people have already retired, Dr. Mays was elected to the Atlanta Board of Education and became its first black president.

Dr. Mays dined with heads of state and gave advice to American presidents. But he was always deeply concerned about children and about the world they would inherit. His leadership during Atlanta's school desegregation struggle of the early 1970s was solid and wise. He is credited with, almost single-handedly, keeping the school board from splitting along racial lines. "People so respected him that they would never do anything to dishonor him," school attorney Warren Fortson once said.

As testimony to Dr. Mays' impact on his times, especially in the South, numerous monuments to him already stand. The Atlanta School Board suspended its policy against naming facilities for the living, and Benjamin E. Mays High School opened in 1978. In Epworth, S.C., where whites once terrorized his family, an intersection was renamed Mays Crossroads. A portrait hangs in the South Carolina capitol.

Dr. Mays was called on to eulogize his protege, slain civil-rights leader Martin Luther King Jr., in 1968. He said, in part: "God called the grandson of a slave and said to him, Martin Luther, speak to America about war and peace, speak to America about social justice, speak to America about racial discrimination, about its obligations to the poor."

The same could be said about Benjamin Mays. And he responded with courage, dignity, wisdom, style—and effect. In his later years, Dr. Mays was a thin, frail-seeming man, but he cast a huge shadow, and all of us found refuge in its shade. One of the giants is gone.

BENJAMIN ELIJAH MAYS: AN INSPIRATION TO EVERYONE

He was a leader of leaders, a teacher of teachers. Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. called him "my spiritual mentor and intellectual father."

A humanitarian, a thinker, an achiever, a non-violent civil rights activist who proclaimed he would "never let race beat me down," Benjamin Elijah Mays deserves his place in the forefront of American history.

Born the son of ex-slaves in 1895, he was 19 before he could spend a full term in school. He was 52 before he voted for the first time. He was 60 by the time the U.S. Supreme Court had opened the way to slow progress toward school desegregation.

But he overcame the odds of his times. For 26 years he was a tireless champion of Morehouse College, teaching and counseling America's black leaders: Julian Bond, Maynard Jackson, Judge Horace Ward, historian Lerone Bennett. At 76 he was elected Atlanta's first black school board president, giving the city its "Atlanta Compromise" on the explosive school desegregation issue. He remained on the board until age 83.

"The achievements of the man would be astonishing for anybody," Samuel DuBois Cook wrote in prefacing Mays' autobiography. But his optimism in changing the South overshadowed all.

"I used to not be able to sing Dixie," Mays once said, "because Dixie represented everything that was evil to me about the South. Now I can sing Dixie."

Dr. Mays believed, truly believed, in the worth of the individual. "I used a very homely expression," he once said. "If you wear a size 13 shoe, you don't go around moping the fact . . . It's your shoe. It's your feet. You accept it. No man is free until he accepts what he is."

Benjamin E. Mays accepted what he was and made of himself an inspiration to generations of leaders, black and white. He made of himself a free man and he helped countless others find freedom through the pursuit of education and the renunciation of hatred.

His passing makes Atlanta a much poorer city.

MAYS PLANTED SEEDS OF REVOLUTION IN CHAPEL AT MOREHOUSE

(By Noel C. Burtenshaw)

Sedition was hatched in the chapel.

The revolution was sown on Tuesday mornings in the chapel on the Morehouse campus.

● This "bullet" symbol identifies statements or insertions which are not spoken by the Member on the floor.

Dr. Benjamin Mays, president of Morehouse, waded into injustice unmercifully in those chapel gatherings. The men of Morehouse would go to the far ends of the South, to the far ends of the nation. They would even be found across the new nations of Africa. Always they would remember the Tuesday morning chapel meetings.

"I spent half of my life," says the ever-young minister and educator, "demonstrating to myself I was not inferior. I spent the rest carrying that message to the students at Morehouse."

They learned it well on Tuesday mornings in the chapel.

"They would come up to me after chapel," recalls the famed Atlanta leader, "and want to chat and question. That was all right. They came first in my book. Sadie, my second wife, (his first wife, Ellen, died in 1922) and I often had them over to the house just to sit and chat. That was good too. We all learned a lot."

Sedition was planned at Mays' home also. "Your mind does not have to sit in the back of the bus," he would say.

They sat. They hoped. They learned. When the time to march came, they, his men of Morehouse, would be ready.

It was in that chapel on the campus that he pounded home the message. "I went into a police station in Tampa one time to get some information. They looked at me and said 'Nigger, take your hat off when you speak to us.' Well, I never wore a hat again. There are ways to rebel. I have spent my life doing it. You can too."

They listened. Down the years, they listened.

In the mid-1940s, a bright young man from the city of Atlanta came to Morehouse. He was not a resident on campus. He lived at home. His father was an Atlanta pastor. Going to the Tuesday chapel assembly was not a necessity for him. But young Martin Luther King Jr. never missed a morning. And he had questions—lots and lots of questions.

"Often, he followed me to the office," recalls Mays in his home in southwest Atlanta, "and we would talk for ages. Sometimes faculty members wanted to see me, but if Martin was there first, we talked. He was always there first."

The young King introduced his college president to his family. Sunday dinners became a regular occasion. The friendship and lifelong association took place. The faith teachings, the life experience, the determination of Dr. Benjamin Mays to be fully free were all deposited for future reference in the mind of the black minister's son—Martin Luther King Jr.

"The first crisis between the King family and I came," remembers the former Morehouse president, "when Martin wanted to lead the Montgomery march. His father did not want him to go. 'Enough has been done' was his attitude. He called me and I said, 'this is his moment, this is God's will, let him go.'"

King went and marched to the strains of the old spiritual: "Ain't gonna let nobody turn me round, turn me round, turn me round. . . ."

Dr. Benjamin Mays had lived by that spiritual all his glorious days. He is a son of the South. He was born on "Dr. Childs' place" out in the country, in Greenwood, S.C., back in 1894. Both his parents were former slaves.

Memories of those South Carolina days are vivid. "I remember meeting my first mob when I was 4. They were on their way to Phoenix (S.C.) to lynch Negroes. I remember knowing this is not right. I am a person like them. I remember my father telling us how he fought two white men at one time. He knocked one down and then took on the other. I felt good for him.

"I remember there were two things blacks did not do. First was pass a white man on a dusty road. Second was pass a white man on a muddy road. I also remember that my father did both."

"I remember that I wanted to learn, to go to school, but my father wanted me on the farm to work. So we compromised. I was allowed to go four months of the year. The rest I gave to him."

But it wasn't enough for the young Benjamin. Education was his vocation. He felt it. He knew his destiny lay in fulfilling his own need to know and also the unmet needs of blacks in the South. He armed himself well for that life of academics.

"I got a lot of opposition, it was hard going," remembers Mays. "My father did not want me to go to South Carolina State. My teachers there said I would freeze (I almost did) if I went to Lewiston in Maine and funds almost prevented me going to the University of Chicago. But I followed my destiny." He obtained his doctorate in Chicago and in 1940 became president of Morehouse in Atlanta.

"I knew I was at home here in Atlanta," says Mays, "but like the rest of the nation and especially the South, life for a black man or woman was not easy."

The message of inferiority was constantly being preached and to those willing to accept or believe the message, life could be simple, The president of Morehouse had no intention of believing or allowing others to believe those heretical preachings.

"You handled it in this way," says the untiring revolutionary. "You used segregated facilities only when you had to. I did not ever have to go to a segregated theater, so I didn't go. But I had to use the public bus at times. It was difficult to have to go to the back or maybe not get on at all. If too many whites showed up, you got no seat."

The men of Morehouse looked to their president for leadership, but so did his city and also the nation. "When Pope John died in 1963, I was one of five Americans sent to the funeral by President Kennedy. That was an honor. I asked then-Vice President Johnson on the plane how he felt about civil rights. He told me things were moving too slow. I would meet and speak with him many times (when he was) president on the same matter. . . .

President Kennedy had my admiration although he was scared for the March on Washington in 1963. I marched with Martin on that occasion. Bobby Kennedy was another great one. He asked me to come to Los Angeles for his final run for the nomination in 1968. I couldn't go but I did speak to the black ministers in Los Angeles for him. I was so glad he won. It was tragic, too.

"In Atlanta, Ivan Allen, the mayor, was a friend and a friend of our cause. Also Chief (of police Herbert) Jenkins was a good man. He was very helpful at times. He called me when Martin was killed and he said he knew that blacks were beginning to gather at Paschal's Restaurant for a march on downtown. He asked me if I could stop the march. I told him I could not. 'Okay,' he said, 'give me 20 minutes to get the right officers over there to make sure we can keep it calm.' I knew I could hold them for 20 minutes. I did. There was a peaceful march.

"Of course," remembers the famed educator, "it was Mayor (William B.) Harstfield who first hired black police in Atlanta, and he will be remembered for it. They had to use the Butler Street 'Y' as their police station and they could not arrest whites. But it was a beginning."

The most exciting time for Benjamin Mays during his long and varied life was the Martin Luther King era. Freedom was sensed. The dream of a lifetime was coming true. Was King the greatest leader of black people?

"No, he wasn't the greatest leader," said Mays. "We have had no one great leader since Booker T. Washington. And I hope we never need just ONE again. Martin was one of many. He brought them together—the teachers, the doctors, the tradesmen, and inspired them all to rise up. The moment had come."

Was one man responsible for Dr. King's death? "One man shot him," says Benjamin Mays pointedly, "and he's behind bars. But others were involved. The police let him escape. He was arrested in Europe. Of course, there was a conspiracy. They wanted him dead; someone paid to have it done. He disturbed the status quo. And the conspirators are still out there."

Before King left for Memphis and his final march on behalf of the garbage strikers in that city, he came to see his old teacher. "It was another campaign for him. There was always danger. He knew it. It was no different from the others. He knew it would be dangerous." Dr. King was shot on April 4, 1968. He was 39 years old. Dr. Benjamin Mays, before a crowd of 200,000 people, preached his eulogy.

For 27 years he had served as president of Morehouse College. He had been mentor and spiritual father to Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. Presidents and prime ministers have sought his counsel. Each year this modern-day prophet, who has seen and helped an entire nation change its legal system to heal injustice, travels from coast to coast carrying his respected message that all men and women are God's children. My question to this unique man of our generation was this: Now that segregation is dead, what is the next chapter for the minority peoples of this nation?

With ice in his clear voice, tempered by the softness in his all-seeing eyes, he answered, "Who said it is dead?"

In that final instant I had the feel, I believe, of those revolutionary roots planted over many years in the Morehouse chapel by Benjamin Mays.●

IN RECOGNITION OF SERVICE—HAROLD ROSSMAN

HON. TOM LANTOS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 9, 1984

● Mr. LANTOS. Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to pay tribute to my good friend, Harold Rossman, who has played an important and distinguished role in the recent history of the San Francisco Peninsula. After several years of unstinting service to the community, he is now taking well-earned retirement.

Harold Rossman was born and educated in Chicago, and studied journalism at Northwestern University. Following graduation he worked for two Chicago papers, the Southtown Economist and the Daily Times. He developed a strong interest in labor matters and was a charter member of the Newspaper Guild on its formation in 1935. However, this deepfelt commitment to union activities led him to pay a high price—in 1937 he was fired from his job.

After a brief stay in Denver as the editor of the local Mine, Mill and Smelter Workers Union newspaper, he came to the west coast expressly to set up another CIO publication, the Labor Herald. He served as its editor for 10 years and brought it to a circulation of 250,000 weekly.

Harold's interest in union affairs led him to the Olympic Press in Oakland, a chain of weekly newspapers. In addition to this position he advised the local Operating Engineers and the Bay Counties District Council of Carpenters on their publications. In addition to his dedication and commitment to labor journalism, he also made time during this period to work on a masters degree in adult education at UC Berkeley, which he received in 1969. In 1972 he helped found San Mateo County Labor—the jointly owned newspaper of the San Mateo County Building & Construction Trades Council where he worked until this month.

I am delighted to join in recognition of the contribution made by Harold Rossman to both this Nation and his profession as a journalist—he represents civic commitment at its very best. We wish him many more years of active achievement, and many more challenges to be met as successfully as he has met those of the past.●

H.R. 4170: PROPOSED TAX HIKE ON DISTILLED SPIRITS IS UNFAIR

HON. ROMANO L. MAZZOLI

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 9, 1984

● Mr. MAZZOLI. Mr. Speaker, I am aware, as we all are, of the damage that the mounting Federal deficits could do to the long-term as well as short-term health of the economy if they are allowed to continue to grow unchecked.

Therefore, I am pleased that both the House and Senate are moving ahead expeditiously with deficit-reduction programs. And, I commend the leadership of both Houses for taking up such an important—but, also, such a controversial—issue in an election year.

I have said all along that the only way Congress can get a handle on the runaway deficits is to make some tough fiscal and economic choices—that is, to swallow hard and cast the tough, difficult votes.

However, Mr. Speaker, I cannot support the rule providing for the consideration of H.R. 4170, the tax bill for 1984. I do so, in particular, because H.R. 4170 contains a provision raising excise taxes on distilled spirits.

It is estimated that this proposed increase—raising the tax by a full 36 percent to a per-proof-gallon charge of $14.25—could result in the loss of 18,300 jobs in the distilled spirits industry nationwide. Kentucky alone could lose over 500 jobs.

Mr. Speaker, we in Louisville and Jefferson County are only now recovering from the battering we received during the recession. Our unemployment rate is still above the national average. We simply cannot afford to lose any more jobs.

In my district—despite the best efforts of local, State, and Federal officials—plant after plant has closed down leaving our working men and women and our community reeling. I cannot turn my back on these men and women and on my hometown whose livelihood and future are on the line.

One other word, Mr. Speaker. It is easy enough, I guess, for our colleagues to pick on industries like distilled spirits and tobacco to bear more than their fair share of the Nation's tax burden. Our colleagues feel these industries are recessionproof and will weather the hardest economic storms and emerge stronger than ever.

Well, Mr. Speaker, that is no longer the case if it ever were. Both of these industries—which are key industries in Kentucky—are hurting and the proposed increased tax on distilled alcohol spirits and the retention of the "temporary" excise tax on tobacco, adopted in 1982, bid to do even more hurt.

A supportable, effective deficit-reduction plan must make the spending cuts and order the revenue increases in a fair and equitable manner so that no one industry or one group—whatever its public image—is unduly burdened.

Here, Mr. Speaker, it seems the distilled spirits industry has been singled out for special attention. The proposed increase in the distilled spirits tax is about the only new tax included in H.R. 4170. The rest, for the most part, are continuations of taxes already on the statute books or are efforts to plug so-called tax loopholes.

It would have been better had H.R. 4170 explored other revenue-raising options—options fairer to the working man and woman—such as the elimination of tax incentives for costly and unproductive corporate mergers, repeal of the 1981 cuts in the windfall profits tax on oil, or, delay in the effective date of tax indexing.

Unfortunately, the Senate Finance Committee has also focused on the distilled spirits industry. Although the Finance Committee's revenue bill calls for a smaller increase in the excise tax than the House bill does—20 percent as compared with 36 percent—the Senate bill also calls for an accelerated tax payment schedule for the industry.

Currently a distiller is given 30 days from the date a transaction is reported to pay the applicable excise tax. Distillers estimate that it takes an average of 60 days to receive payments for their product from their wholesalers. So, most distillers have to borrow money to remain current in paying the excise taxes to the Government.

The Senate Finance Committee's bill would cut this 30-day payment period to 14 days. Not only would this worsen the financial position of the distilled industry—and require distillers to incur larger finance charges for their borrowed funds—but a change to 14 days would alter the excise tax payment plan developed in 1979 to offset an advantage importer of distilled spirits were accorded in a Trade Act passed that year. It has been estimated the industry could pay as much as $25 million a year in extra interest charges because of the shortened period for remitting excise taxes and the increase in the cost of borrowing funds.

In addition to this "double whammy" the industry will be put at an unfair trade disadvantage with foreign producers who are working aggressively to take over domestic markets.

And so, Mr. Speaker, I have no choice, despite the worthy provisions which are incorporated into H.R. 4170, but to vote against the "closed" rule recommended for H.R. 4170—permitting no amendments to be offered from the floor. If this rule is defeated, I hope a new one is written which will permit H.R. 4170 to be amended when it is returned to the floor.●

REDUCING THE UNPRECEDENTED AND INTOLERABLE BUDGET DEFICITS

HON. BERKLEY BEDELL

OF IOWA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 9, 1984

● Mr. BEDELL. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased that the House has acted on a proposal that begins the necessary process of reducing the unprecedented and intolerable budget deficits which we now face.

Clearly, Mr. Speaker, it was imperative that we act. Record deficits, and accompanying high interest rates, are ravaging our farm economy, stifling our export markets, endangering our small businesses, and threatening to undermine prospects for a sustained economic recovery. I believe that our Federal budget crisis is the most critical domestic challenge facing our country today—it is a ticking time bomb—and it must be resolved.

In particular, I want to point out the disastrous impact of Federal deficits on the agricultural economy. In the years I have been in Congress, I have never been besieged with so many calls, letters, and personal visits from people expressing anguish over the possibility of having to dispose of their machinery, liquidate their livestock, sell their farm, and lose their home. For the younger farmers—those who were to be our next generation of farmers—the decision to sell out must be an extremely difficult one. But for those hard-pressed farmers who are just a few years short of their retirement years, being forced out must be an especially troubling experience. What is a 53-year-old farmer to do next?

Large budget deficits are harmful to agriculture on two counts. First, the high-interest rates which result from the Federal Government competing with farmers and others in the credit market to finance the deficits are driving up farmers' borrowing costs to record levels. In fact, 1982 marked the first year that total interest payments by farmers exceeded net farm income. It is not an exaggeration to say that if interest rates returned to their historical levels, many, many farmers who currently find their backs against a wall would instead have a viable, if not health operation.

Second, high interest rate are keeping our dollar at record levels, and leaving our farm export markets stagnant. Administration officials have estimated that the dollar is overvalued by some 32 percent— it is as if there is a 32-percent tax on everything we export. The strong dollar was one of the primary factors which led, in 1981, to the first downturn in the value of our farm exports in 12 years, and that decline has not yet been reversed. With the production from nearly 2 of every 5 acres in the United States destined for export, it is clear that an expanding export market is vital to assuring the health of our farm economy.

Most of the farmers with whom I have spoken seem to recognize that the best "farm bill" which this Congress could approve would be a budget resolution which substantially reduces the anticipated Federal deficits. Only when these deficits are reduced, they reason, will interest rates subside, will the dollar move more in line with other currencies, and will the farm economy have a chance to get back on its feet.

If the severity of our deficit crisis requires that we act, Mr. Speaker, then I think the magnitude of the budget imbalance also makes clear that our deficit reduction effort be balanced and broad-based. I believe that anyone who examines the issue in detail, as I have, will recognize that the only fair and realistic way to reduce these deficits is through a comprehensive approach which includes reductions in defense and domestic spending, revisions in our entitlement programs, and tax increases.

Even President Reagan himself, on December 29, 1982, said that:

> We're going to be faced with horrendous deficits for several years . . . You cannot cut the budget enough to balance it. You cannot raise taxes enough to balance it.

The need for a comprehensive approach to controlling our deficits also becomes apparent as one reviews the estimated components of next year's budget. The fiscal year 1985 budget, as proposed by the President, can be segmented as follows:

	Percent
Military programs	30
Social security and other retirement programs	23
Interest on the debt	12
Medicare	7
Assistance to the poor	5
Health programs	4
Transportation	3
Veterans benefits	3
Unemployment compensation	2
Agriculture	1.5
Education	1.5
Energy and Environment	1.5
Training and social services	1.5
Community development	1
Everything else	4

Our social security and medicare programs are financed separately by specific taxes, and thus for all practical purposes, they may be considered apart from other items in the budget. These programs—particularly medicare—should and certainly will be examined for reductions to assure their long-term solvency, but I think we can reasonably agree that the expenditures and revenue for these programs should be considered separately—just as they were before they were included in the unified budget in 1969.

Isolating social security and medicare in this way makes it easier to focus on the other expenditure items in the budget and the general revenues which must be provided for these purposes. This separate consideration highlights the fact that our deficit-control efforts must be directed at reducing expenditures for these other programs, or increasing taxes.

As we know, Mr. Speaker, the President has declared that the defense budget is virtually off-limits as far as being a source for spending reductions. In addition, I think we all agree that the Government must make good on its obligation to pay interest on the national debt, so we cannot ignore Federal interest payments.

Consequently, if we are to reduce the estimated $200 billion annual budget deficits, and if the deficit reduction is to be accomplished solely through spending cutbacks, then, as I have outlined above, almost all of the budget cuts must come from those expenditures other than for social security, medicare, the Department of Defense, and interest payments on the national debt. I believe that it is clear, from the figures I have presented, that this feat would be nearly impossible, unless the people of this country are willing to accept drastic cutbacks in or the elimination of such basic programs as aid to education, the FBI, the National Park Service, basic research, farm programs, and so on.

Indeed, the Director of the Congressional Budget Office (CBO) testified recently before the Committee on Agriculture that if our current fiscal course is not changed, then by fiscal year 1989, essentially all revenues received by the Federal Government will be absorbed by social security, medicare, defense, and interest on the debt, with no funds remaining for any other Federal activity.

Moreover, CBO has concluded that by fiscal year 1986, total outlays of the Federal Government will exceed the level that would have occurred that year had no changes been made in Federal spending programs since President Reagan took office. CBO, in its analysis, adds that the spending increases are due to the fact that the defense build-up and skyrocketing interest payments will overwhelm the cuts in domestic spending enacted under the Reagan program.

Mr. Speaker, the weight of this information, I believe, requires that any realistic and fair effort to reduce Federal deficit include a comprehensive package of defense and domestic program spending cuts, as well as tax increases. I believe that any budget which this House was to adopt must meet this test of balance and fairness.

A number of the various budget alternatives that were before the House offered a reasonable and responsible course for coming to grips with our deficit problem.

First, although the budget offered by the Congressional Black Caucus presented the most ambitious deficit reduction proposal—some $324 billion over the next 3 years—I believe its call for an actual rollback of defense spending, a nearly $180 billion increase in taxes, but almost $100 billion more in new domestic spending, was neither balanced nor realistic, and was properly rejected.

The budget proposal which I favored—and the one which called for the second highest deficit reduction target of the eight proposal before the House—was that offered by Mr. McHugh. His proposal would have reduced the deficit by $262 billion over the next 3 years by holding defense spending increases to the inflation rate, reducing domestic program expenditures by $16 billion, and increasing taxes by $76 billion. Additional savings would have resulted from the lower interest costs associated with the reduced deficit.

The McHugh proposal, in my opinion, met the important fairness and balance test. Moreover, it made a sizable reduction in our estimated deficits—far higher than the deficit reductions proposed in the President's February budget or in the budget offered by Mr. LATTA. Finally, the McHugh budget was realistic and one that we could have implemented this year.

Following defeat of the McHugh alternative, I then supported the proposal offered by Mr. MACKAY, which was quite similar to the McHugh plan except that it proposed to reduce the deficit by $234 billion, as compared to the $262 billion reduction in the McHugh alternative.

In the wake of the defeat of both the McHugh and MacKay budget proposals, Mr. Speaker, I voted, first, against the Latta proposal—because of its unacceptable 7 percent real growth in defense spending—and then in support of the alternative offered by the chairman of the Budget Committee, Mr. JONES.

The Jones budget alternative did meet the balance test—it cuts domestic spending by $16 billion but provides for a 3.5-percent real increase in both defense and entitlement spending, to be financed by $50 billion in tax increases. However, I am disappointed that this measure does not go far enough in reducing the deficits. Its 3-year deficit reduction total is only $182 billion. In addition, I believe that it is wrong to take the revenue increases provided in the Jones budget and channel that revenue into more and more defense and entitlement spending. In my opinion, that additional revenue should be earmarked for deficit reduction, pure and simple.

However, there was one feature of the Jones proposal that I did find attractive. For the first time ever, the House had before it a budget measure which officially incorporated—albeit in modified form—the pay-as-you-go concept. I have been a strong proponent of pay-as-you-go since it was first advanced by Mr. MILLER of California some years ago. However, I believe that pay-as-you-go, as originally envisioned, should be used to finance both inflationary and real increases in spending, if indeed the decision is made to increase spending at all. In the Jones budget, unfortunately, pay-as-you-go is used merely to finance real increases in defense and entitlement spending, and thus does little to check our deficit, much less reduce it.

Mr. Speaker, I was pleased that we took the first steps to reduce the record deficits coming at us, and I hope that we stay on this course, and resolve to take the more difficult measures which certainly lie ahead, if we hope to reduce the deficits to acceptable levels. The future of our economy, and perhaps our very country, requires that we act.●

FRANK CHURCH—A GREAT AMERICAN

HON. TOM LANTOS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 9, 1984

● Mr. LANTOS. Mr. Speaker, my wife, Annette, and I had the extraordinary privilege of being friends of Frank and Bethine Church. Frank was an American leader of immense intelligence, integrity, compassion, and breadth. Our Nation's leaders have paid tribute to him today.

I want my tribute to be one to the incredible partnership that Bethine and Frank enjoyed. It was a partnership of extraordinary effectiveness and sensitivity, of mutual respect and love and admiration. Frank derived strength from this partnership in times of setback, turmoil, and anguish, just as he relished it during periods of triumph and joy.

Bethine and Frank Church as a team were the best America could produce. We know that Bethine will carry on Frank's work because that is what he would have wanted her to do.●

THE FEDERAL BUDGET: RHETORIC VERSUS REALITY

HON. AUGUSTUS F. HAWKINS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 9, 1984

● Mr. HAWKINS. Mr. Speaker, once again Congress is focusing most of its attention on producing a budget, with this year's process fixated on reducing deficits, our country's new public enemy No. 1.

Unfortunately, little attention is being paid to this country's real No. 1 problem, jobs, or rather the lack of jobs for those Americans who want to work. Moreover, the budget proposed which offers the brightest hope for addressing the problem of unemployment and our Nation's deficit will probably receive the fewest number of votes when it is brought to the floor of this body. The budget I am speaking of is the Congressional Black Caucus alternative budget—a proposal which provides a real downpayment for millions of poor Americans by allocating resources for programs that benefit those most in need.

The 9 million people out of work, and the 30 million people living in poverty in this country would greatly benefit from a number of initiatives that are contained in the CBC alternative. Among the initiatives included in the CBC proposal is H.R. 1036, the Community Renewal Employment Act, which passed the House last year. This bill would provide 500,000 improvement and service jobs to individuals who have been unemployed for long periods of time. In addition, the CBC budget contains moneys for H.R. 5017, the Youth Incentive Employment Act, which would provide part-time and full-time summer employment to economically disadvantaged youth who are pursuing further education to training leading to meaningful employment—a program which would benefit some 1 million young people.

The CBC alternative also increases funding for the Job Training Partnership Act (JTPA) to insure that those who desperately want to work will have the chance to qualify for the positions that will be available in the coming decades.

In the last few years social service programs and agencies have had increased demands placed on them for the delivery of essential services like food, clothing, and housing, which have strained their resources and forced them to turn away many in need of assistance. At the same time, the Reagan administration has cut back on the very programs that exist to benefit the needy. The CBC budget recognizes these problems and moves to restore much of the damage done by the Omnibus Reconciliation Act of 1981. Funds for programs like the community services block grant, title XX, Older Americans, Volunteers in Service to America (VISTA), and child abuse prevention and treatment would be restored and or increased under the CBC budget.

The final component of the CBC budget that I consider vital to the future growth of our country is a commitment to the education of our young people. The CBC budget proposes a major expansion for the successful chapter I compensatory education program and the vocation/adult education program, along with restoration of funds for elementary and secondary education programs and student aid. Without this investment in our leaders of the future this country could well lag behind the other industrialized powers of the world.

The CBC alternative embodies greater compassion for the needs of disadvantaged and working Americans, fiscal responsibility in terms of defense expenditures, tax equity, control of inflation without increasing unemployment, greater attention toward our domestic needs, and a deficit below that of any other alternative offered. The Congressional Black Caucus does not believe that the pay-as-you-go concept is the way for our country to return to the prominence it once knew, but rather supports pay as you need as an investment in human deficit reduction that will pay long range economic dividends.●

TRIBUTE TO THE 1984 MASSACHUSETTS STATE BASKETBALL CHAMPIONS—B. M. C. DURFEE HIGH SCHOOL OF FALL RIVER

HON. BARNEY FRANK

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 9, 1984

● Mr. FRANK. Mr. Speaker, "Durfee Hilltoppers Rule the State Once Again." That was the headline that appeared in the Fall River Herald News on Monday, March 19 and it says it all. On Saturday evening, March 17, the Durfee High School basketball team capped a perfect season by defeating Springfield Tech 77 to 62 to capture the Massachusetts Interscholastic Athletic Association Division I Basketball Championship. For Coach Tom (Skip) Karam, it marked the third time Durfee has won the State crown under his leadership. Overall, they posted a 25 and 0 record, displaying the poise and character that make champions, as all Durfee teams throughout the years, both on and off the court. Among the titles won they were the Rogers Christmas Tournament champions, Southeastern Massachusetts Conference Division I champions, South Sectional Massachusetts Tournament champions and finally, State champions. Nationally, they are ranked 25th in the country. Durfee's loyal fans and all the residents of the city of Fall River are proud of the Durfee High basketball team, 1984 State champions.●

PUBLIC BEING MISLED

HON. BRIAN J. DONNELLY

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 9, 1984

● Mr. DONNELLY. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to express my grave concern and deep disappointment in connection with a letter many of my constituents have been receiving. It is a letter from former Congressman James Roosevelt, and asks the recipient to send $10 to join the National Committee To Preserve Social Security and Medicare. I cannot determine the answer to my constituents' inquiry of whether the National Committee To Preserve Social Security and Medicare is legitimate. I leave that to those who have the legal authority to make such determinations and to pursue appropriate remedies. I can determine, however, when a letter is misleading, demagogic, and personally offensive. I believe Mr. Roosevelt's letter meets all three criteria.

Mr. Roosevelt's enterprise is misleading from the outset. The envelope in which his letter arrives has been designed to look like a communication from the Government, with red and blue printing in the upper left-hand corner reading, "official documents." In large letters the face of the envelope says, "Urgent! Important social security and medicare information enclosed." The urgent and important information, it turns out, is a list of exaggerations and half-truths, purportedly listing the cuts Congress is planning for the social security system. A few examples from the letter should suffice to convey its general tone:

> Never in the 45 years since my father, Franklin Delano Roosevelt, started the social security system has there been such a severe threat to social security and medical benefits.

It goes on:

> Some (politicians) are saying, in effect, "Let the retired widow go without a decent meal or enough heat or health care. Let her live in an unsafe neighborhood and wear shabby clothes. But, please, not 1 less gallon of gasoline for my limousine!"

And what solution does Mr. Roosevelt propose for the misdeeds of these politicians? Send $10 to the President's son and his National Committee To Preserve Social Security and Medicare. For $10, Mr. Roosevelt will deliver your "official petition," which has its own official certified petition number to your Congressman. The implication, of course, is that a petition to Congress must be official, and is best delivered by Mr. Roosevelt. Leaving aside the fact that Mr. Roosevelt has never delivered any petition to my office, and because I have decided to leave the question of this organization's legitimacy to others, I am disturbed that my constituents are being misled into believing they must spend $10 to express their views to me. I find it particularly disturbing that a former Member of Congress would impede intelligent and rational discussion of social security by frightening and misleading recipients in this manner.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I find this letter a personally offensive misuse of Mr. Roosevelt's family name and his status as a former Congressman in an enterprise which seeks to make a profit by capitalizing on the fears and insecurities of the elderly. To invoke the name of Franklin Delano Roosevelt in this shoddy enterprise is simply shameful. Frightening and misleading those who are most susceptible, in the name of F.D.R., is Mr. Roosevelt's gravest disservice. I can explain the right to petition Congress and the financing of social security to my constituents. I leave it to Mr. Roosevelt to explain his involvement in this solicitation.●

INVESTIGATION SOUGHT REGARDING APPROPRIATIONS FOR REFUGEE SOCIAL SERVICES

HON. DON EDWARDS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 9, 1984

● Mr. EDWARDS of California. Mr. Speaker, recently, all 28 members of the California Democratic Congressional Delegation sent a letter to the President seeking his personal intervention into the fiscal year 1984 funding decisions of the Office of Refugee Resettlement. In addition, in a letter to the Comptroller General, we have requested an investigation concerning the possibly unlawful impoundment of some $35.6 million appropriated under the continuing resolution for refugee social services.

The refugee program is the fulfillment of the Federal responsibility toward those individuals granted refuge in the United States. The cuts in social services and targeted assistance reflect an attempt to renege on that responsibility.

The following States have areas which are highly impacted by refugee/entrant populations and will be particularly hurt by the proposed cuts. The amounts lost, according to ORR's published targeted assistance and social services allocations, are also shown:

	Amounts cost
California	$9,015,762
Colorado	243,898
Florida	6,290,881
Hawaii	236,321
Illinois	1,106,823
Kansas	249,489
Louisiana	225,489
Maryland	237,171
Massachusetts	448,401
Minnesota	756,657
Missouri	136,951
New Jersey	543,538
New York	1,052,242
Oregon	621,929
Pennsylvania	508,193
Rhode Island	288,751
Texas	768,982
Utah	188,745
Virginia	589,960
Washington	933,418

For the record, I am today submitting our letter to the Comptroller General and to the President.

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D.C., March 29, 1984.

Hon. CHARLES A. BOWSHER,
Comptroller General of the United States, General Accounting Office, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. BOWSHER: I am writing to ask that you investigate the Administration's proposed FY 1984 funding of the Refugee Resettlement Program. I believe that the Administration's proposed allocations for social services under this program, as published in 49 Fed. Reg. 5383 (Feb. 13, 1984), amounts to an unreported and, therefore, unlawful rescission proposal under the Impoundment Control Act, 2 U.S.C. Sec. 681.

In its February 13 publication, the Office of Refugee Resettlement (ORR) states that it "expects to have available $44,400,000 in refugee/entrant social services funds and $81,500,000 in refugee/entrant targeted assistance funds. This determination has been made based upon an interpretation of the Second Continuing Resolution for FY 1984 (Pub. L. 98-151) as requiring that social service funding be recalculated using assumptions of refugee arrivals lower than those which were anticipated when the FY 1984 budget request was developed, and also as providing that targeted assistance funding be at the same level as in FY 1983."

I submit that this interpretation of the continuing resolution, reducing the social services appropriation significantly, amounts to an impoundment of funds.

Pursuant to Public Law 97-377, the Congress specifically provided $80 million for refugee/entrant social services in FY 1983. At the request of ORR, approximately $8 million of social services funding was later reprogrammed. Thus, the final allocation for social services in FY 1983 was $72 million.

Fiscal year 1984 funds were appropriated under Public Law 98-151, 97 Stat. 964. That continuing resolution states:

"(c) Notwithstanding any other provision of this joint resolution, except section 102, such amounts as may be necessary for continuing the following activities, not otherwise provided for in this joint resolution, which were conducted in the fiscal year 1983, under the terms and conditions provided in applicable appropriation Acts for the fiscal year 1983, at the current rate:

* * * * *

"Refugee and entrant assistance activities under the provisions of title IV of the Immigration and Nationality Act, title IV and part B of title III of the Refugee Act of 1980, and sections 501 (a) and (b) of the Refugee Education Assistance Act of 1980: provided. . . ."

97 Stat. 972. The language "under the terms and conditions provided in applicable appropriations Acts for fiscal year 1983, at the current rate" is Congress' clear statement that the appropriation for fiscal year 1984 is to be not less than the amount appropriated in fiscal year 1983, $80 million for social services.

Thus, ORR is, in my opinion, unlawfully withholding significant amounts of funds appropriated by Congress for social services through its continuing resolution for fiscal year 1984.

In addition, Congress has been quite clear, indeed definitive, in its rejection of the ORR rationale used to reduce the amount actually appropriated by Congress. In both the House and Senate Reports on Public Law 97-363, the Refugee Assistance Amendments of 1982 (H. Rept. No. 97-541, S. Rept. No. 97-638), Congress rejected the Administration's 1983 social services authorization request as "inadequate and premised on an unsound theory." The reports reiterate that "the proper focus should be on the number of refugees who need such services, regardless of their date of entry." (emphasis added). S. Rept. at 5, H. Rept. at 8. Following the authorizing committees' rejection, the Appropriations Committees for fiscal year 1983 rejected ORR's funding request of $59 million as inappropriate and appropriated instead $80 million based not on entry numbers but on actual program needs.

During the 98th Congress, the House Judiciary Committee's Report accompanying the Refugee Assistance Extension Act of 1983, H.R. 3729 (H. Rept. No. 89-404), stated that the Committee "flatly rejected the theory upon which the Administration's fiscal year 1983 social services budget request was made." The Report noted that the Committee was "disturbed" that the fiscal year 1984 social services funding request was again based on anticipated flows, and reiterated that it saw "no basis in law or logic for such an approach." Once again the Committee asserted that "the proper focus should be on the number of refugees that need such services."

Even ORR admits the inadequacy of the $44 million to continue the activities conducted in fiscal year 1983. Specifically ORR states:

"ORR believes that the use of targeted assistance funds in a combined allocation with social services funds is an essential and appropriate response to the special programmatic needs of States in FY 1984. . . . Also, supplementary funds would be targeted, under this proposal, to provide States with 90 percent of their FY 1983 formula allocations in order to avoid serious disruptions or terminations of services which would affect refugees currently receiving services or expected to need services during the year. Fed. Reg. at 5383 (emphasis added).[1]

In conclusion, Congress has specifically appropriated FY 1984 funds "at the current rate" and has specifically and repeatedly rejected the ORR proffered rationale that would permit a recalculation of the appropriation "using assumptions of refugee arrivals." Finally, ORR admits that the recalculated amount is not even sufficient to fund the continuation of the services received in 1983, thereby necessitating the taking of funds from another program for a hold-harmless provision.

Due to the importance of these funds to State and local governments, your expeditious response would be greatly appreciated.

Thank you.

Sincerely,

DON EDWARDS,
Member of Congress.

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D.C., March 23, 1984.

The PRESIDENT,
The White House,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: We are writing to you to express our grave dissatisfaction with the manner in which the Department of Health and Human Services' (HHS) Office of Refugee Resettlement (ORR) is distorting the intent of Congress in its operation of the nation's refugee resettlement program.

The results of this abuse are not only of serious fiscal consequence to the State of California, but they do a most unfortunate disservice to a programmatic concept that embodies some of the finest humanitarian ideals of this country.

We are addressing our concerns to you directly for two reasons. First, as a fellow Californian and our former Governor, you may be better able than most to appreciate the consequences of efforts to convert an issue of national public interest to one of local financial impact. Second, we believe that much of the problems in this area derive from directives of your Office of Management and Budget, and are not necessarily at the program level within HHS.

Specifically, we strongly disagree with ORR's proposed FY84 funding levels for refugee and entrant social services and targeted assistance. While, on the surface, our difficulties may appear to involve a misinterpretation of the amounts appropriated for these programs in Public Law 98-151, making further continuing appropriations for FY84, at the heart of the matter lies a more serious misundertanding of the reasons Congress has fashioned these important programs.

We believe that the Congress has made very clear that the objective of the Refugee Act is to help those persons granted refuge in the United States to adjust to the truly "new world" in which so many find themselves and to become self-sufficient as soon as possible. The key to this self-sufficiency is the social services program, specifically provided with a line item authorization by Congress to underscore its critical role in this regard.

Unfortunately, because of the manner in which ORR continues to base its funding request for this program, evidenced most recently in its notice of proposed FY84 social services funding in the Federal Register of February 13, 1984, this goal continues to be thwarted. Despite very strong language in both the House and Senate Judiciary Committees' Reports accompanying the Refugee Assistance Amendments of 1982 (Public Law 97-363) rejecting the Administration's FY83 social service funding request as both "inadequate and premised on an unsound theory" and reiterating Congressional intent that "the proper focus should be on the number of refugees who need such services, regardless of their date of entry," ORR has admitted once again in testimony this week before the House Appropriations Committee to having used a unit formula based on recent arrivals.

We find this blatant circumvention of clear Congressional intent to be inexcusable. This is made even more the case given the adoption by the House of Representatives of the Refugee Assistance Extension Act of 1983, H.R. 3729, on November 14, 1983. The House Judiciary Committee's Report accompanying this measure (House Report No. 98-404) once again stressed that the Committee "flatly rejected the theory upon which the Administration's fiscal year 1983 social services budget request was made." The Report went on to note that the Committee was "disturbed" that the FY84 social service funding request was again based on anticipated flows, and reiterated that it saw "no basis in law or logic for such an approach." Instead, the Committee once again asserted that "the proper focus should be on the number of refuees that need such services."

Can there be any doubt, then, as to the manner in which social service funding requests are to be developed? We think not, and yet ORR gives its FY83 unit formula as the basis for its FY84 budget request which it now insists is all that is available to the social services program under the Continuing Resolution. However, even ORR admits that the $44.4 million derived in this manner is inadequate, and proposes to transfer $20 million in targeted assistance funds to the social services program "in order to avoid serious disruptions or termi-

[1] ORR has proposed transferring $20 million from the targeted assistance program into social services. I understand, however, that as of this date no reprogramming request has been received by the Appropriations Committee.

nations of services which would affect refugees currently receiving services or expected to receive services during the year."

While we are not convinced that even the $64 million level of funding for social services is adequate, we are particularly frustrated that this total is to be achieved by a transfer from the $81.5 million in targeted assistance funds ORR has available to it for FY84. Once again, we believe that ORR is ignoring the basic reason Congress provided funding for targeted assistance.

In its materials offered in support of the FY85 budget request, ORR links the funding level for targeted assistance with the number of refugees who have been in the United States for three years or less and categorizes this special funding as having been "created to deal with unanticipated high levels of refugee admissions." We submit that this is not at all the case.

Targeted assistance funds have been provided by the Congress to alleviate the fiscal and social impact on State and local governments as a result of large concentrations of refugees and entrants. For example, while there was an inordinately high number of refugee admissions in 1981 (159,000), the need for "a supplementation of currently available resources for services to refugees" in certain counties—to use ORR's own words in setting forth the criteria for the allocation of targeted assistance funds in June of 1983—was not the result of the overall number of admissions, but their concentration in a very few selected areas of the country.

Therefore, to reason that the amount of and need for targeted assistance funds will automatically decline in some direct proportion to the number of recent arrivals and the number of years that have passed since admissions peaked in 1980-81 is to ignore the very purpose of this supplemental funding. Such an approach fails to acknowledge the fact that since 1975, one State alone—California—has become the home for almost 50 per cent of all refugees resettled in the United States, more refugees than at least the next eight most heavily impacted States combined. Such an approach ignores the fact that almost one-third of refugees receiving aid in California were initially resettled in other States.

In summary, the results for many counties and municipalities of such a "targeting" of this special-needs population were the very reasons that targeted assistance was funded. The House Judiciary Committee has stressed this purpose in its Report accompanying H.R. 3759, mentioned earlier, by specifically instructing ORR that "the legislation, unlike the Administration's program, anticipates that funding allocations will be made on the basis of a county's total refugee population, not just those refugees who have been in the United States for three years or less." Unfortunately, ORR has ignored this directive and published an allocation formula for FY84 targeted assistance funds that has the same basis as that which the Committee specifically repudiated.

Furthermore, the House Judiciary Committee Report goes on to emphasize that "targeted assistance grants should not supplant other refugee program funds." However, ORR proposes to do just that. ORR is reallocating $20 million of the $81.5 million in targeted assistance funds to social services, thereby disregarding this clear Congressional directive. This is unacceptable. This is exacerbated by ORR's intention to use an additional $10.5 million in targeted assistance funding for "national projects" which are not earmarked for those areas that ORR has designated as highty impacted.

We are equally disturbed by ORR's limiting the use of targeted assistance solely for the support of employment and employment-related services. There is no Congressional authority for any such exclusive limitation on the use of targeted assistance. Rather, Congress has recognized that the fiscal and social impacts of high concentrations of refugees are felt by the mental health, health care, criminal justice, and educational systems of our communities.

We support the goal of economic self-sufficiency for refugees. However, there are other important services which strengthen the infrastructure of this population, without which self-sufficiency is not possible, that are also impacted by high concentrations of refugees. We do not believe that the total responsibility of assisting these support services that are highly impacted belongs solely to State and local governments. Once again, the House of Representatives, in approving H.R. 3729, endorsed a change in ORR's current policy in order to "not preclude the use of some targeted assistance funds for other important activities, such as assisting local health departments to meet the costs of providing treatment to refugees."

We hope that this letter has served to document the reasons for our deep distress with the misdirection of this program. We trust that you will perceive the problem, as we do, to be not simply a matter of reasonable people disagreeing as to a possible interpretation of a program philosophy. ORR's arrogance in its operation of the program is an affront to the Congress, and a clear and direct contravention of the letter of the law.

The nation, and not just California, has welcomed these individuals to our shores. The nation, not just California, will benefit, as we have in the past, from the important additions to our social and cultural fabric that are provided by those to whom we have granted refuge. The nation, and not just California, must share the financial responsibility of assisting in their assimilation. We call on you, as a fellow Californian, for your personal commitment to this important goal, and your personal assistance in bringing the Refugee Resettlement Program into agreement with Congressional intent.

THE JAWS OF DEATH—BAN THE STEEL JAW LEGHOLD TRAP

HON. TOM LANTOS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 9, 1984

● Mr. LANTOS. Mr. Speaker, on Saturday, April 7, on the steps of the Lincoln Memorial, thousands of people gathered—not to enjoy the beautiful cherry blossoms—but to focus world attention on the plight of the millions of animals unnecessarily tortured, often to death, in leghold traps. This second annual "Mobilization for Animals" involved the largest coalition of animal protection groups and individuals yet seen in our history. They came together to protest—in unison—one of the most appalling atrocities committed against animals by man.

Steel jaw leghold traps brutalize their victims in the most agonizing way imaginable. Trapped animals break their bones, crush their teeth, and even chew off their own limbs in their frenzy to escape the metal jaws. Some creatures starve; some die of exposure and exhaustion when traps are neglected for days at a time. The traps are utterly indiscriminate. Loved pets, trained hunting dogs, and endangered wild species lose their lives, or their limbs if they are lucky, with unconscionable frequency.

What is incredible to me is that none of this suffering brings any benefit to anyone. There are humane alternative traps readily available which allow pets and nontarget animals—called trash animals by the trapping industry—to be freed without resultant laceration, fractures, or gangrene.

Efforts to outlaw these horrendous instruments date back to the previous century, I feel I am in distinguished company when I find Charles Darwin stating in 1863 that:

> Few men could endure to watch for 5 minutes, an animal struggling in a trap with a crushed and torn limb, yet animals linger thus every night. One must wonder how such cruelty can have been permitted to continue in these days of civilisation.

I wonder that same question today in this country. England's Parliament eventually heeded voices such as Darwin's, and is now one of over 50 nations which have banned use of these horrible and inhumane weapons of death.

I am proud to be cosponsoring H.R. 1797—to end the use of steel jaw leghold traps. I laud the over 100 of my colleagues who are also cosponsoring this bill. A substantial majority of the American public, 78 percent according to a study at the Yale School of Forestry, is solidly behind this legislation. I encourage all the Members of this body to take notice of the mobilization and to join in this vital, long-needed step toward the humane treatment of all creatures.●

ELECTRIC UTILITY COMPETITION ACT OF 1984

HON. ALBERT GORE, JR.

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 9, 1984

● Mr. GORE. Mr. Speaker, I am introducing today a bill designed to increase competition within the electric utility industry. My bill, the Electric Utility Competition Act of 1984, would promote competition in two ways. First, it would promote competition in the licensing and relicensing of hydroelectric projects by extending the State and municipal licensing preference to this country's 1,000 rural electric cooperatives. Second, it would provide for an antitrust review when existing hydroelectric projects come up for relicensing by the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission.

Late last year, my colleague, the gentleman from Alabama (Mr. SHELBY) introduced a bill, H.R. 4402, which would eliminate the municipal preference in the relicensing of existing hydroelectric facilities and virtually guarantee that existing licenses would be reissued to the original licensees in perpetuity. My colleague, the gentleman from New York (Mr. OTTINGER) recently introduced his own bill on hydroelectric relicensing, H.R. 5299. At the time of introduction, he stated that, in his view, H.R. 4402 did not represent sound public policy. He further observed that "it is in the public interest that there be meaningful competition for expiring licenses rather than a presumption that the existing license should continue." I fully agree with that statement.

It is clear that the public does benefit from a competitive relicensing process. In fact, in the few competitive relicensing cases to date, we can see the benefits of such competition. For example, in two cases in California, the existing licensee, submitted applications advising the Commission that it could not make additional improvements in the licensed projects. Publicly owned utilities subsequently filed competing applications demonstrating that improvements could be made and additional capacity obtained from the projects. This prompted the existing licensee to submit amendments to the applications which contained plans to improve the projects. Competition will also prompt competitors to strive to improve recreational facilities and mitigate or eliminate adverse environmental consequences associated with existing hydroelectric projects. Benefits from this competition will flow to the general public regardless of who wins the new license.

Unfortunately, there has not been a significant amount of competition for the future use of this public resource. By the end of 1983, 126 licenses had expired. Approximately 86 new licenses had been issued to existing licensees in uncontested proceedings. There has been competition for only 11 of the remaining projects up for relicensing. Ten of those involved competing applications filed by municipalities entitled to the preference under the Federal Power Act, while one involved a competing application filed by the Confederated Salish and Kootenai Tribes in Montana.

Based on these figures, I believe it is clear that the preference in the Federal Power Act provides the stimulus necessary to encourage municipalities to compete for the future use of this public resource. However, even with the preference for States and municipalities, past experience suggests that many projects will be relicensed to existing licensees in uncontested proceedings. Thus, to counterbalance this and further encourage competition in the relicensing of hydroelectric projects, my bill would extend the preference to rural electric cooperatives.

My proposal is entirely consistent with numerous other Federal statutes which extend a preference for the purchase of federally generated power to both municipal electric systems and rural electric cooperatives. In my view, the Federal Power Act does not provide a preference to these cooperatives for one very simple reason. The Power Act was passed in 1920 while the Rural Electrification Act was not passed until 1936.

The second part of my bill would require that an antitrust review be undertaken by the Department of Justice at the time of relicensing. The review contemplated here is identical to the antitrust review Congress directed should be undertaken when applications were submitted to the Atomic Energy Commission—now the Nuclear Regulatory Commission—for licenses to construct and operate nuclear power facilities. In the relicensing context, my bill would require that a broad inquiry of the applicant's activities would be undertaken to determine whether activities under the license would create or maintain a situation inconsistent with Federal antitrust laws.

I would again refer to the comments made by the gentleman from New York (Mr. OTTINGER) when he introduced his relicensing legislation. He stated: "The Nation's waterways are public resources. The public owns them. Similarly, the energy potential of these waterways is public. The public owns it too, although it takes investment to harness the potential. Thus, I think it entirely proper that the public should be as certain as possible that any entity using this public resource under license will conduct its business in a manner consistent with the public interest and, in fact, will enhance the attainment of desirable public objectives. Why should the public settle for anything less?"

Clearly, the Federal antitrust laws were established to insure that business enterprises would be conducted in a manner consistent with the public interest. Indeed, the antitrust laws establish a code of conduct to protect the public interest and provide penalties for violating that code. I believe it is appropriate to demand that those who receive licenses granting them the free use of this public resource should be held to this code. The antitrust review prior to relicensing will accomplish this goal.

Mr. Speaker, I insert in the RECORD at this point the text of my bill together with an analysis.

H.R. —

A bill to amend the Federal Power Act to promote competition in the generation, transmission, and distribution of electric energy

Be it enacted the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled

SEC. 1. This Act may be cited as the "Electric Utility Competition Act of 1984."

STATEMENT OF FINDINGS AND PURPOSE

SEC. 2. Congress hereby finds and declares the following:

(a) Competition is an important factor in promoting efficiency in the electric utility industry and thereby lowering the costs of electricity to the ultimate consumers;

(b) The use of the Nation's existing hydropower resources should be licensed to encourage competition in the electric utility industry;

(c) The Nation's electric consumers would benefit if there were broader markets available for both the purchase and sale of excess energy and capacity;

(d) There is less than an optimum exchange and distribution of both existing hydro resources and generation sources in the electric utility industry;

(e) The maintenance and enhancement of the competitive factors within the regulated electric utility industry are necessary to promote the well-being of the Nation's electric consumers.

PREFERENCE FOR RURAL ELECTRIC COOPERATIVES

SEC. 3. Part I of the Federal Power Act, title 16, section 792 through 823, of the United States Code, is amended as follows:

(a) In section 796(3) after the word " 'municipalities' " add "or cooperatives";

(b) In section 796 add a new paragraph (8) as follows and renumber succeeding paragraphs accordingly: "(8) 'Cooperative' means a non-profit making organization of individuals organized primarily for the purpose of supplying electricity to its own members and eligible for financing pursuant to provisions of the Rural Electrification Act of 1936;"

(c) In section 797(e) insert after the word "municipality", the words "or to any cooperative or association of cooperatives;"

(d) In section 797(f) insert after the word "corporation", the words, "(other than a cooperative or association of cooperatives)" and strike the words, "State or municipality", and insert "State, municipality, cooperative or association of cooperatives".

(e) In section 800(a) strike the words, "State and municipalities", and insert "State, municipalities, cooperatives and associations of cooperatives".

(f) In section 803(e) strike the words, "States or municipalities", and insert "States, municipalities, cooperatives or associations of cooperatives"; and insert after the word, "public" "or to cooperative members".

RELICENSING ANTITRUST REVIEW

SEC. 4. The Federal Power Act is hereby amended by adding the following new Section 15A (16 U.S.C. § 808A):

"(a) The Commission shall promptly transmit to the Attorney General a copy of any application for a new license under Section 15 of this Act, and the Attorney General shall, within a reasonable time, but in no event to exceed 180 days after receiving a copy of such application or written request, render such advice to the Commission as he determines to be appropriate in regard to the finding to be made by the Commission pursuant to subsection (c). Such advice shall include an explanatory statement as to the reasons or basis therefor.

(b) Upon the request of the Attorney General, the Commission shall furnish or cause to be furnished such information as the Attorney General determines to be appropriate for the advice called for in subsection (a).

(c) The Commission shall publish promptly the Attorney General's advice in the Federal Register. Where the Attorney General recommends a hearing, or on the motion of any party to the license proceedings, the Commission shall hold a hearing prior to making the finding required by this subsection. The Attorney General or his designee may participate as a party in the proceedings held by the Commission. The Commission shall give due consideration to the advice received from the Attorney General and to such evidence as may be provided during the proceedings in connection with such subject matter, and shall make a finding as to whether the activities under the license would create or maintain a situation inconsistent with the antitrust laws as specified in subsection (f) of this section. In making its finding, the Commission shall conduct a broad inquiry into both the past and proposed activities of the license applicant, which shall include consideration of all alleged anticompetitive activities of the applicant and the potential anticompetitive consequences of issuing the new license to the applicant.

(d) In the event the Commission's finding under subsection (c) is in the affirmative, the Commission shall publish its finding in the Federal Register. If no competing license application is pending, the Commission shall hold the application on which its finding was made in abeyance for a period of 180 days from the date its finding is published in the Federal Register, during which period the Commission shall, notwithstanding any other provision of the Federal Power Act, permit any citizen, association of citizens, domestic corporation, cooperative, municipality or state to submit an application for the new license.

(1) If there is no competing application for the new license, the applicant submitting the application as to which the Commission made an affirmative finding will have been deemed to have satisfied the requirements of this section. The Commission shall have authority to issue a new license to the applicant with such conditions as it deems appropriate.

(2) In the event that one or more competing applications for the new license are filed, the Commission shall fulfill the requirements of subsections (a)-(c) as to each such competing application. In the event the Commission's finding under paragraph (c) is in the negative for any such competing application or applications, the application or applications for which the Commission's findings under paragraph (c) are in the affirmative shall be rejected. In the event the Commission's finding under paragraph (c) is in the affirmative for each such competing application, the Commission shall have authority to issue a new license to the best qualified applicant with such conditions as it deems appropriate.

(e) With respect to any application for a new license on file at the time of enactment into law of this section, the Commission, after consultation with the Attorney General may, upon determination that such action is necessary in the public interest to avoid unnecessary delay, establish by rule or order periods for Commission notification and receipt of advice differing from those set forth above.

(f) As used in this section, 'antitrust laws' shall include the following Acts, as amended, 'An Act to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies' approved July second, eighteen hundred and ninety [15 US.C. §§ 1 et seq.]; sections seventy-three to seventy-seven, inclusive, of an act entitled 'An Act to reduce taxation, to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes' approved August twenty-seven, eighteen hundred and ninety-four [15 US.C. §§ 8 et seq.]; 'An Act to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes' approved October fifteen, nineteen hundred and fourteen [15 US.C. §§ 12, 13, 14 et seq.; 20, 21 22 et seq.; 29 U.S.C. §§ 52, 53]; and 'An Act to create a Federal Trade Commission, to define its powers and duties, and for other purposes' approved September twenty-six, nineteen hundred and fourteen [15 U.S.C. §§ 41 et seq., 47, 48, 50 et seq.]."

ANALYSIS

INTRODUCTION

This legislation is intended to increase competition in the electric utility industry. First, the bill would provide that the municipal preference in the licensing and relicensing of hydroelectric projects would also be available to rural electric cooperatives.

Second, the amendments will bar the issuance of a new license for an existing hydroelectric project to any utility which is or has engaged in anti-competitive activities under the federal antitrust laws when there is a competing license applicant which has acted in accordance with those laws. In so doing, the legislation ensures that utilities that are given the privilege of utilizing our national resources have not, and do not, engage in anti-competitive activities.

These amendments are essential to the maintenance and enhancement of competition between consumer-owned and investor-owned utilities. If enacted, their effect could well be to lower costs to all customers. The provisions thus ensure the preservation of a pluralistic and competitive electricity generation, transmission and distribution system.

BACKGROUND

The bill promotes competition in the electric utility industry by extending the municipal preference in licensing and relicensing of hydroelectric projects to rural electric cooperatives and by establishing antitrust review procedures to be followed in all hydroelectric relicensing proceedings.

Rural electric cooperatives currently enjoy the same preference extended to municipal electric utilities with respect to access to federally generated power. The cooperatives were not granted the preference in licensing and relicensing for a very simple reason. The Federal Water Power Act was enacted by Congress in 1920. The Rural Electrification Act was not enacted until 1936. Since that time, and for the same fundamental reasons, rural electric cooperatives and municipalities have been treated equally in the numerous statutes which contain preference provisions. Thus, the bill would remedy what was essentially an accident of history.

The preference under the Act clearly applies in both licensing and relicensing situations. There has been considerable discussion regarding the relicensing preference during the past few months, and legislation has been introduced to eliminate this preference. It has been suggested that the preference will harm consumers while providing no compensating public benefits. It is suggested further that this is an issue of great consequence—a "crisis in the making"—ultimately leading to the "socialization" of every non-federal hydroelectric project throughout the country. The facts do not substantiate these arguments.

The initial 50 year licenses began to expire in the 1970s. By the end of 1983, approximately 126 licenses had expired. During the license terms, the original licensees had recovered their investment and earned a handsome profit.

Out of those 126 cases, 86 new licenses were issued to the initial licensees. Out of the 39 cases pending at the FERC at the end of 1983, only nine involved competing applications filed by municipal applicants. Only one competitive relicensing case had worked its way through the process. That case involved the Merwin Dam on the Lewis River in Washington.

In that case, the Commission concluded that the plans submitted by the original licensee, Pacific Power & Light Co., were superior to those submitted by the preference municipal applicant, and thus the new license was awarded to PP&L. (The Commission also overruled an earlier Commission decision which had been affirmed by the courts and held that the municipal preference did not apply against the holder of the original license. That question, as well as the Commission's decision awarding the license to PP&L, is now before the federal courts.)

Notwithstanding the limited number of competitive relicensing cases to date, it is clear that the public receives significant benefits from the existence of the municipal preference and the competition for the future use of this public resource which it fosters. The relicensing preference—which serves simply as a tie-breaker when all else is equal—provides the necessary incentive for municipalities to compete for the future use of this public resource. In several pending cases, competing municipalities have submitted applications clearly superior to those initially filed by the existing license holders. For example, municipalities have proposed plans to increase capacity at certain existing projects, recommended improvements in recreational facilities, and suggested ways to mitigate adverse environmental effects associated with the projects. None of these recommended improvements would have been forthcoming absent the competitive relicensing process. No matter who wins the licenses, the public will benefit because many of the improvements recommended by the municipalities will be included as license conditions when the new licenses are ultimately issued.

Unfortunately, as noted, most relicensing proceedings to date have not resulted in the filing of competing applications. Because the benefits of competition for the future use of this public resource are so clear, Congress should act to expand the number of potential competitors. This would occur if the current municipal preference were extended to all rural electric cooperatives. Section 3 of the bill is designed to achieve this result.

Section 4 of the bill deals with an antitrust review during the relicensing process. Congress in 1920 adopted the licensing and relicensing preference provisions not only to promote competition for the use of this public resource but also to promote competition within an essentially monopolistic industry. The preference has been successful on both counts. However, investor-owned utilities are still the dominant force in the electric utility industry, and they have demonstrated little reluctance to use their monopoly power to the detriment of consumer-owned utilities. For example, they control the transmission network and frequently exercise that control in an anticompetitive fashion. Since transmission lines are the arteries of the industry, the parties controlling those arteries also control the future of the industry itself. Too little attention has been paid to this problem in the past.

Section 4 is designed to deal with this problem. It closely parallels Section 105 of the Atomic Energy Act of 1954, Public Law No. 83-703, 68 Stat. 919, as amended in 1970 (codified at 42 U.S.C. § 2135). That Act requires the Nuclear Regulatory Commission ("NRC") to consider the antitrust implications of a proposed nuclear power plant before issuing a construction or operating license. This Act requires a similar antitrust review of any application for a new hydroelectric license for an existing project under section 15 of the Federal Power Act.

Under Section 105(c) of the Atomic Energy Act, the NRC may rescind or refuse to issue a license if the activity sought to be licensed would "create or maintain a situation inconsistent with the antitrust laws." That provision requires the NRC to consider the antitrust implications of an activity or activities of a licensed applicant other than those directly arising from the activity sought to be licensed. In other words, the NRC must make a broad-ranging, comprehensive review of the applicant's business activities to determine whether they have been, or will be, anti-competitive. See Alabama Power Co. v. Nuclear Regulatory Commission, 692 F.2d 1362 (11th Cir. 1982). This Act contains the same language, and the Commission must therefore conduct a similar review under this amendment.

SECTION-BY-SECTION ANALYSIS

Section 1 provides that the Act may be cited as the "Electric Utility Competition Act of 1984."

Section 2 contains the statement of findings and purpose.

Section 3 amends various provisions of part of the Federal Power Act in order to provide rural electric cooperatives with a preference in licensing and relicensing of hydroelectric facilities. There amendments would grant rural electric cooperatives the same preference currently extended to states and municipalities.

Section 4 establishes an antitrust review process to be employed during the relicensing of hydroelectric facilities.

Section 4, paragraph (a) requires the Commission promptly to transmit to the Attorney General a copy of any license application under Section 15. The Attorney General would have a "reasonable time, but in no event to exceed 180 days after receiving a copy of such application or written request," to "render such advice to the Commission as he determines to be appropriate in regard to the findings to be made by the Commission" with respect to antitrust considerations. To facilitate an earlier review by the Attorney General, it is expected that, promptly upon enactment into law of this bill, the Commission and the Attorney General will work out a suitable understanding in regard to the nature of the information the Attorney General would wish to receive.

Paragraph 4(b) provides that, upon the request of the Attorney General, the Commission shall furnish or cause to be furnished "such information as the Attorney General determines to be appropriate" for the advice he has to give. It is expected that the Commission will make every reasonable effort to provide the information sought by the Attorney General.

Section 4(c) requires the Commission promptly to publish in the Federal Register the advice that it receives from the Attorney General. It further provides for a hearing if the Attorney General or any party to the license proceeding so requests. The Commission must then give "due consideration" to the advice received from the Attorney General and to other evidence that it may receive during proceedings in connection with the antitrust review. Whether or not the Attorney General appears as a party, all advice and information provided by the Attorney General that is utilized by the Commission in arriving at its findings must be made a matter of record. If the Attorney General advises that there may be adverse antitrust aspects or antitrust issues, or if such issues are raised by another party in a manner according with the Commission's rules and regulations, the Commission must make a finding as to the antitrust implications of the license application.

The Commission's review will focus on whether "the activities under the license would create or maintain a situation inconsistent with the antitrust laws." This language is directly borrowed from the Atomic Energy Act. Thus, as in Alabama Power Company (id. at 1365), and as in other NRC decisions, the Commission must take into consideration such issues as (1) unfair methods of competition by threats to terminate service to another utility, (2) the anticompetitive effect of contract provisions between utilities, including exclusive dealing arrangements, (3) refusals to interconnect, coordinate, or wheel power, and (4) refusals to permit competitors from participating in regional economic coordination. To underscore the broad nature of this review, the Act further provides that the Commission shall consider "all alleged anticompetitive activities of the applicant and the potential anticompetitive consequences of issuing the new license to the applicant."

Paragraph 4(d) provides that, if the Commission finds adverse antitrust effects, and if no competing application is pending, it must hold the application in abeyance for a period of 180 days from the date of the Attorney General's publication of his advice in the Federal Register. During that period, any citizen, association of citizens, domestic corporation, cooperative, municipality, or state may submit an application for the new license, even though the time for submission of such a competing application may have expired under other provisions of the Federal Power Act.

Paragraph 4(d)(1) provides that, if there is no competing application, the applicant is deemed to have satisfied the requirements of this section, and the Commission shall proceed to assess the merits of the application without regard to the antitrust laws set forth in paragraph (f). However, the Commission may impose conditions relevant to the antitrust issues upon the license that is ultimately awarded.

Paragraph 4(d)(2) provides that competing applications are subject to the antitrust review set forth in paragraphs (a)-(c). If any such application or applications is found to satisfy the antitrust requirements, then all applications for which the Commission rendered an affirmative finding would be rejected. If none of the competing applications is found to satisfy the antitrust requirements, then the Commission may issue a new license to the best qualified applicant in accordance with paragraph (d)(1).

Paragraph 4(e) provides that any application for a license on file at the time of enactment into law of this section may be treated in an expedited fashion in order to avoid unnecessary delay, and the Commission may establish procedures for such expedited treatment by rule or order.

Paragraph 4(f) lists the federal statutes applicable to the antitrust review required under subsections (a)-(c). These include the following laws: the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C. §§ 1-7; the Wilson Tariff Act, 15 U.S.C. §§ 8-11; the Clayton Act, 15 U.S.C. §§ 12-27; and the Federal Trade Commission Act, 15 U.S.C. §§ 41-49.●

EL SALVADOR: HIGH STAKES ON A BAD BET

HON. MICHAEL D. BARNES

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 9, 1984

● Mr. BARNES. Mr. Speaker, I want to bring to the attention of my colleagues two articles that appeared together in a recent edition of the Washington Post. One by a liberal and one by a conservative, both raise serious questions about the Reagan administration's policies in El Salvador. While the articles were published before the recent election, they retain their relevance after the election, because they raise fundamental issues of policy that the election cannot resolve no matter who finally wins.

I hope my colleagues will give these articles their careful attention.

[From the Washington Post, Mar. 23, 1984]

EL SALVADOR: HIGH STAKES ON A BAD BET

(By Philip Geyelin)

For quick temporary relief from the discomforts of the American presidential primary process, your attention is invited to Sunday's presidential election in El Salvador. By the administration's reckoning, the East-West stakes are high—as in Lebanon.

But, as in Lebanon, there is the real prospect that another great gamble with the Fate of the Free World will go wrong in the worst sort of way—which is to say, needlessly. By betting not just regional but global stakes on an intractable local conflict, the United States is in danger of losing all out of proportion to what it can hope to win.

As a matter of principle, you cannot fault the effort the administration has made to provide for El Salvador's first free and honest presidential election in some 50 years. The stage has been meticulously set. The military, historically the arbiter of Salvadoran politics, has promised to keep its hands off. It is likely that Sunday's vote will qualify as a model of participatory democracy against unbelievable odds.

The hope of U.S. Ambassabor Thomas Pickering—and of the administration—is that this will win congressional sympathy for increased U.S. military and economic aid to intensify the struggle against international communism in Central America. The ambassador even sees the election as a "weapon against the insurrection" in the sense that the guerrillas will be confronted by a president with a legitimate mandate. Some of the more moderate among the rebel elements may then see virtue in joining the process.

But there is a real possibility that the exercise will backfire and cut the ground out from under the administration's Salvadoran (and, by extension, Central American) policy, by further souring rather than sweetening congressional support. It is possible that out of Sunday's nice, clean electoral process will come some very dirty business.

There are three serious candidates: Jose Napoleon Duarte, who headed up a military-civilian junta from 1980 until 1982; Roberto D'Aubuisson, a 40-year-old charismatic, ruthless, hard right-winger widely held responsible for the murderous "death squads"; and Francisco Jose Guerrero, a shopworn remnant of the corruption and crooked politics of bygone days.

Guerrero might be the least troublesome of the three. But he and three minor-party candidates are likely to throw the contest into a runoff next month between Duarte and D'Aubuisson. Either way, that's trouble: D'Aubuisson's reputation precedes him in Congress in a way that would further undermine support for military aid; this could encourage a Salvadoran military coup against D'Aubuisson; so much for Salvadoran democracy. Duarte is a liberal by local standards, so much so that D'Aubuisson calls him a "communist." His election would be an invitation to increased right-wing terrorism, if not his overthrow.

In the end, the army will probably be the custodian of the outcome. But the army itself is deeply divided. So the administration's prospects in El Salvador are not likely to be improved. This portends more tugging and hauling with Congress and more of what administration strategists most deplore: at best, an openended, inconclusive U.S. involvement or, at worst, a collapse of the central government.

EL SALVADOR: HIGH STAKES ON A BAD BET

(By Edwin M. Yoder, Jr.)

In "The March of Folly," historian Barbara Tuchman explores a strange but persistent problem: Why do governments sometimes ignore clear warnings of clamity and pursue a policy "contrary to self-interest"? The book would be an excellent primer for analyzing the Reagan administration's policy in El Salvador. I am not thinking of short-term issues, such as the administration's request for "emergency" military aid. Secretary of State George Shultz has solemnly warned that without it the Salvadoran army could collapse, so perhaps there is a case for yielding this time to executive judgment.

But where is this reliance on the Salvadoran army taking us? There is an obvious gap between this administration's exalted public expectations for El Salvador and what you read and hear about the reality every day. This poor, murderous, disorderly country is a long way from anything like stable democracy.

For instance, Richard Meislin of the New York Times reported that the presidential election in El Salvador is widely expected to bring "new instability" to the country, whoever wins. For all one can see, years of pressure and preaching in Washington have not broken the cycle of murder by "death squad" that is a way of life for the miserable people. The rule of law, elementary social justice, the tolerance of a political opposition; these are alien ideas in El Salvador.

So where, in this melange of misery, is the basis for that "democracy" we think we are promoting there? It is not visible to the naked eye, unless that eye be clouded by that willful attachment to unavailing policy which, says Tuchman, has characterized "the march of folly" from Troy to Vietnam.

Given that the administration's policy looks like a bad bet, should the United States then lurch to indifference? No, the suggestion that the choice is between extremes comes naturally to the president, and his spokesman, and is familiar in such situations. It is almost invariably false. Measured and moderate policies are available, notably the political and diplomatic mediation of the so-called "Contadora" group (Mexico, Panama, Venezuela, Colombia). These countries lack our clout, but they share the Latin heritage, and are on the scene. The Reagan administration has applauded the Contadora process. But it has also pursued a policy that may exacerbate instability—for instance, by flooding El Salvador with arms.

Reagan's instincts regarding Central America may be marginally preferable to those of George McGovern, who seems to be saying that a Marxist salient in the region makes little difference to American interests. But only marginally. One's estimate of Reagan's capacity for realism is hardly improved by memories of the position he took six years ago on the Panama Canal treaty. What do you suppose might be the situation in Panama today if his advice had been heeded, and the treaty rejected? A hundred thousand American soldiers guarding the Canal Zone against sabotage? The thought isn't implausible. And what room would that have left in the budget, or our attention spans, for El Salvador?●

HOME CARE WEEK

HON. OLYMPIA J. SNOWE

OF MAINE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 9, 1984

● Ms. SNOWE. Mr. Speaker, I want to offer my support for House Joint Resolution 525, a measure designating the week beginning November 25, 1984 as National Home Care Week. Mr. PANETTA of California has offered this legislation for the past few years to focus needed attention on alternatives to institutionalization for many elderly and disabled persons in less than life-threatening situations.

As our Nation grows more aware of demographic changes and the increase in our elderly population, it is important that Congress allocate special time to highlight programs, such as home health care, which benefit the most vulnerable in our society. All too often, institutionalization is the only health care alternative for our senior citizens and their families. High home health costs, limited support from medicare, medicaid and other health insurance programs, and the lack of tax incentives for families force many individuals into nursing homes.

The recent increase in the number of home health care agencies only emphasizes the obvious demand for these services. Currently there are over 4,000 home health agencies providing skilled nursing services, physical therapy, speech therapy, and other home health services throughout the country. My own State of Maine has an excellent home-based care program which on average serves its patients for almost one-half of the cost of an intermediate care facility bed and at one-quarter of the cost for a skilled nursing facility bed.

Mr. Speaker, we in Congress must encourage alternatives to traditional health services. In our interest to reduce health care costs, we should also be concerned that quality care is available to those who are able to remain in their own home. By observing Home Health Care Week, we pay tribute to home care groups such as those in Maine presently engaged in providing quality home care to our senior citizens, and I urge my colleagues to support this resolution.●

THE UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA AT DAVIS, 75TH ANNIVERSARY

HON. VIC FAZIO

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 9, 1984

● Mr. FAZIO. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to the University of California at Davis, located in my congressional district, which this year is celebrating its 75th anniversary.

In just three-quarters of a century, Mr. Speaker, UC-Davis has risen from a "University Farm" to rank third in size and first in program diversity among all UC campuses.

Long renowned for its strengths in the agricultural and biological sciences, the campus has grown more and more recognized for the quality of teaching and research in the social sciences, arts and humanities, physical sciences, engineering, medicine, veterinary medicine, and the law.

In commemoration of its 75th anniversary, the campus today rededicates itself to excellence in teaching, to the continued pursuit of truth and knowledge through research, and to the dissemination of information through public service activities.

Mr. Speaker, UC-Davis has had a rich history. Chancellor Meyer wrote eloquently of that history in a recent issue of the UC Davis Magazine.

I submit that article for the RECORD:

A MESSAGE FROM THE CHANCELLOR

It is with a great sense of pride that I announce to you the 75th Anniversary Celebration of UC Davis. This marks the beginning of a year-long commemoration in recognition of three-quarters of a century throughout which the campus has distinguished itself in education, research and public service.

In truth, the David campus is rooted more than 75 years in the past. History books record an 1899 conversation during which the seed of an idea to establish an agricultural college was planted. It was then that Peter J. Shields, Secretary of the State Agricultural Society, first learned that California lacked a comprehensive college program in agricultural sciences.

Within two years, Shields' proposal to establish a school of practical farming came before the California legislature, but it did not survive beyond its introduction. Shields persevered, however. A bill he prepared in 1903 was passed by the legislature—only to be vetoed by Governor George Pardee, who said that the bill did not provide enough.

A third bill drafted two years later was submitted to the legislature with an amendment written by Yolo County supporters, describing ideal land specifications and water rights arrangements—a set of conditions which mirrored those available in Yolo County. The bill was passed and signed without hesitation by the governor in 1905. The state purchased 778 acres of what had been part of the Jerome C. Davis stock farm in 1906, and erected the first building—a residence for the University Farm manager—the following year.

The event which our 75th Anniversary Celebration commemorates, however, occurred in 1908; the arrival of the first students on campus.

Our beginnings were modest; the 16 faculty members welcomed a total of 21 agricultural students during that year. The campus grew slowly during its first four decades, during which time the campus graduated from school to college status, and the school of Veterinary Medicine was added. Growth of the Davis campus increased dramatically after its designation as a general campus in 1959. Today, UC Davis ranks third in size and first in program diversity among all UC campuses.

The campus has arrived at a change point in its evolutionary path. Now that we have attained a plateau in size and enrollment, our primary goal is to grow qualitatively. UC Davis has attained recognition as one of the world's great universities. It is time now to build upon our strengths by adding new research and public service programs, by establishing more professors' chairs to attract top faculty, and by initiating more scholarships and fellowships to nurture the inquisitive minds of our students, in whose hands the future rests. It is a goal which requires us to win increasing moral and financial support from public as well as private sectors.

The campus' 75th Anniversary Celebration affords us an opportunity to examine our succcess of the past, to honor the academic achievements of the students and faculty of today, and to illustrate the unrealized potential that lies before us.

Through the year, we hope to demonstrate to our public how far the University to our public how far the University has come in a relatively short time, and thereby cultivate a mutual and lasting personal interest in the Davis campus and the importance it can play in the future for us all.

We warmly invite your participation during our 75th Anniversary Celebration.●

1984 CONGRESSIONAL CALL TO CONSCIENCE VIGIL FOR SOVIET JEWRY

HON. ROBERT A. ROE

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 9, 1984

● Mr. ROE. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to join my colleagues who are participating in the 1984 congressional call to conscience vigil for Soviet Jewry. I would like to thank the Representative from Pennsylvania (Mr. COUGHLIN) for organizing this effort

Words cannot be found to adequately describe the persecution and the pain the Jews of the Soviet Union have endured over the years. Every day, another case of a Soviet Jew being persecuted comes to light. Every day, we hear of somebody being fired from his job, losing his citizenship and being placed behind bars or in a labor camp. Every day, we hear of another person being charged with trumped up crimes such as "spreading anti-Soviet information," "defaming the Soviet State," and "hooliganism." In truth, these ridiculous charges are nothing but the desire to emigrate to Israel and to be free to practice Judaism, rights fully guaranteed by the Soviet Constitution.

One such case is Yuri Tarnopolsky. Arrested on March 17, 1983, 47-year-old research chemist Yuri Tarnopolsky of Kharkov was sentenced to 3 years for "defamation of the Soviet state and social system." He, his wife Olga, and his daughter Irina have been denied visas since 1976.

Although Tarnopolsky is an organic chemist with over 60 published papers, he learned that there are no jobs for refusenik scientists, only menial work or "parasitisim." For 3 years he was unemployed.

The Soviet's repeated refusals to grant Tarnopolsky an exit visa led him to a 40-day hunger strike in 1982. At that time, he wrote: "The refusal is by no means a waiting for visas. It is a slow dying, an agonizing tragedy." After being arrested in March of 1983, he was sent to a labor camp in Chita, in eastern Siberia. Working in a mine, he suffers from pain in his gall bladder and heart. The work is hard, and Yuri finds it difficult to meet his quota. His wife Olga after traveling from their home in Kharkov is denied her visits with Yuri. His health weakened, he began a hunger strike on February 10, 1984.

Last year, he wrote: "We, the refuseniks, myself and my family, are we to be sacrificed to give a lesson to the Jews of the world? * * * my hunger strike had been only so that this question can be shouted as loudly as I could."

Mr. Speaker, we in the Congress of the United States have a moral obligation to shout as loudly as we can about the Soviet treatment of its Jewish citizens, to protest this brutal and ruthless campaign to wipe out the religious and cultural identity of the Jews of Russia. Equally important, we must show to Yuri Tarnopolsky and his fellow Jews that they have not been forgotten, that we in America are more determined than ever before we speak out against the ugly and pernicious oppression of the Jews of the Soviet Union.

Mr. Speaker, in a week's time, Jews all over the world will celebrate the holiday of Passover. The meaning of that joyous day for Jews for hundreds of years has been freedom. It is no less important that in our day, the Jews of Russia will be able to truly enjoy Passover, and to celebrate their freedom, whether in the Soviet Union, in Israel, in America, or in any other part of the world.●

TRIBUTE TO MR. KEVIN McNAMARA, PRESIDENTIAL CLASSROOM PARTICIPANT

HON. GEORGE W. GEKAS

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 9, 1984

● Mr. GEKAS. Mr. Speaker, I would like to comment on the exemplary work done by the Washington Workshop's Presidential classroom program. I recently met with Kevin McNamara of Middletown, PA., one of my constituents, who participated in this program. I was extremely impressed by the caliber of student that takes part in workshops of this sort. Kevin's motivation, enthusiasm, and scholastic ability are admirable qualities that the Presidential classroom encourages, and young men such as Kevin possess the ability to become future leaders of our Nation.●

NATIONAL STUDENT LEADERSHIP WEEK

HON. JOHN H. CHAFEE

OF RHODE ISLAND

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, April 9, 1984

● Mr. CHAFEE. Mr. President, the Senate recently adopted a resolution designating the week of April 23, 1984, as "National Student Leadership Week." It is my hope that the House of Representatives will soon approve this measure, House Joint Resolution 458.

This resolution provides recognition for the more than 10 million young Americans who participate in cocurricular activities in secondary schools across the country.

During the past year, we have engaged in a broad national discussion about the future of education. In developing an agenda for improving our schools, many have stressed the importance of "leadership"—from Washington, from State and local governments, from school boards, teachers, administrators, and parents.

These leaders are making a valuable contribution to the improvement of American education. However, no learning environment can be effective without the commitment and involvement of the student body. America's young people have the most at stake in the drive for quality education. National Student Leadership Week provides a fitting opportunity for us to recognize their active role in enhancing the climate for growth and learning in American schools.

The academic program is extremely important in preparing students for college and careers. But it represents only part of what a student learns in school. Student government, athletics, music, journalism, debate, cheerleading, drama, honor societies, academic and vocational organizations, and other student activities contribute immeasurably to the development of leadership qualities in our youth.

These endeavors provide students with opportunities for self-expression, creativity, and enrichment. They enable students to look beyond the classroom in demonstrating their talents, and to look beyond themselves in learning to solve problems.

During National Student Leadership Week, communities throughout the United States are called upon to recognize and support the many student activities which contribute so much to the well-rounded education of our youth. This observance should provide recognition for those involved in student activities and encouragement to those not yet participating. It will also enable us to express gratitude to the many dedicated faculty members who help to coordinate various student programs.

Student activities generate school pride and encourage young people to take an active part in improving the schoolwide learning environment. In striving to improve our schools, this is a factor we cannot afford to overlook.

We must encourage student leaders today in order for our communities to call upon them for leadership in the future. It is my hope that Congress will approve House Joint Resolution 458 soon and encourage its observance throughout the Nation.●

LEONARD DRUCKER

HON. CHARLES E. SCHUMER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 9, 1984

● Mr. SCHUMER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to commend Mr. Leonard Drucker for his outstanding community service in my district. Mr. Drucker will be honored on May 12, 1984, by his congregation and his community for his lifelong commitment to both.

Mr. Drucker was the vice president for 6 years and the president for 2 years of Temple Beth Emeth. He was also instrumental in the Reform Jewish Youth Groups. In addition, he has served as president of the Brotherhood of Interfaith Relations.

Mr. Drucker's service to the community has not been limited solely to his congregation. Indeed, he was the first vice president of the Flatbush Tenant's Council and helped begin a program of street and tenant patrols in Flatbush. He was elected a judicial committeman and has also served the community by volunteering countless hours to help the handicapped and senior citizens.

Mr. Drucker has enjoyed a successful career in the ceramic tile business. He resides at 2 West End Avenue with his wife, Elaine, and he has two lovely daughters, Leslie and Nadine. I thank him for his service and wish him continued success in his efforts to make Brooklyn a better place to live.●

TOLMAN AWARD FOR DR. JAMES PITTS, JR.

HON. JERRY LEWIS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 9, 1984

● Mr. LEWIS of California. Mr. Speaker, on April 18, 1984, the southern California section of the American Chemical Society will award Dr. James N. Pitts, Jr., the Tolman Medal for 1983. The award is given for "achievements in chemistry, significant practical applications of technology, and dedicated service to the profession." He was selected in recognition of his more than three decades of research in photochemistry and atmospheric chemistry, and his application of this research to understanding and controlling photochemical air pollution. I take this opportunity to ask the Congress to join me, along with his many friends and admirers, in expressing our deep appreciation and gratitude to this outstanding human being for his service to his community, State, and the Nation.

Dr. Pitts began his career as a research scientist in chemical and biological warfare for the National Defense Research Committee of the Office of Scientific Research and Development. After receiving his doctorate in 1949, he joined the chemistry faculty at Northwestern University. In 1954 he moved to the new campus of the University of California at Riverside.

In addition to his extensive work for the university, he has coauthored several books, as well as served as coeditor for four different series published by Wiley-Interscience. He is also coauthor of over 300 articles relating to his fields of expertise.

Because of his unique knowledge of the environment and the problems relating to air pollution, Dr. Pitts has served as a consultant to universities, government, and industry. His work on such groups as the California Attorney General's Desert Environmental Task Force and the Physics Advisory Committee to the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency and others has earned him the respect of those with whom he has worked.

The Tolman Medal will join a long list of special awards that denote this man's exceptional contributions to the environmental well-being of this planet. In 1973 he received the award of the Orange County section of the American Chemical Society for "Service Through Chemistry" and in 1979 Dr. Pitts was chosen recipient of the California Lung Association's Clean Air Award.

Dr. Pitts' research efforts center on the fundamental processes in photochemistry and photo-oxidations, and their application to the atmospheric chemistry of the natural and polluted troposphere. His specific research areas include spectroscopic, kinetic, product, and mechanistic studies of the interactions of reactive species such as hydroxyl and nitrate radicals, ozone, and atomic and singlet molecular oxygen, with a wide range of "relevant" natural and anthropogenic inorganic and organic compounds.

It is difficult to summarize the remarkable contributions this man has made. He is an exceptional person who has dedicated his life to improving the condition of ours. He is a fine example of the intelligent and progressive people in the scientific community who work for our welfare.

Mr. Speaker, I take great pride in commending to my colleagues, Dr. James N. Pitts, Jr., a truly remarkable man who has, through his selfless years of hard work, contributed to his world in a most beneficial way.●

SALVADORAN REACTS TO AMBASSADOR WHITE'S ACCUSATION

HON. WILLIAM F. GOODLING

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 9, 1984

● Mr. GOODLING. Mr. Speaker, I would like to share with my colleagues in the House, an article from Friday's Wall Street Journal. The article is written by Luis Escalante Arce, of El Salvador, one of the Salvadorans accused by former Ambassador Robert White of participation in rightwing terrorist activities directed at El Salvador from Florida. Mr. Escalante's story, which would make interesting reading on its own merit, is particularly interesting in light of Mr. White's allegations. We learn, for example, that this alleged terrorist is in fact the victim of terrorism, having been kidnapped and nearly killed in San Salvador in 1979. Mr. Escalante fled the uncertainty of life in El Salvador and found refuge in New York, not Florida, and for the most part has been received with the kindness and compassion that Americans traditionally afford to those who seek refuge from terror and oppression, former Ambassador Robert White not included. I strongly urge all my colleagues to read Mr. Escalante's account as a balance to Mr. White's allegations.

[From the Wall Street Journal, Apr. 6, 1984]

SALVADORAN REACTS TO AMBASSADOR WHITE'S ACCUSATION

(By Luis Escalante Ave)

Earlier this year, Robert E. White, former U.S. ambassador to El Salvador, announced that six Salvadoran exiles living in Miami were, in large measure, responsible for directing the activities of right-wing death squads in their homeland. As one of those cited by the ex-ambassador. I would like to describe the facts that are rarely, if ever, discussed in connection with the current situation in El Salvador.

Just a few years before the Oct. 15, 1979, fall of Salvador's little-lamented President Carlos Humberto Romero, the country was held in the grip of an orchestrated campaign of terror. Banks and stores were being robbed with impunity, labor strikes were paralyzing factories, public buses were being burned and the kidnapping of widely known and honored community leaders was on the upswing.

Among the many who were kidnapped and for whom large ransoms were paid. I recall the following: Francisco de Sola, industrialist; Benjamin Sol Millet, agribusiness entrepreneur: Ian Chatterton and Cameron Massey, officers of the Bank of London and Montreal, held for several months: Jose David Escobar, farmer; Carlos Emilio Alvarez, physician; Jaime Batlle, coffee exporter, held captive for almost a year; Ernesto Sol Meza, industrialist; Miguel Miguel, industrialist; Fritz Schuitema. Dutch executive of Philips N.V.; Emilio Charur, merchant; Jaime D. Hill, large-scale farmer; Teofilo Siman, merchant, for whom ransom was paid twice; Dimas Funes Hartman, physician; Tomas Peralta, broker; Domingo Call, industrialist; Miguel Arturo Duenas, investor, and Jose Venutolo, farmer.

I also remember a number who were murdered by would-be kidnappers or who died while being held by leftist bands. They include: Ernesto Regaldo, investor; Ernesto Liebes, merchant and honorable consul of Israel in El Salvador; Archibald G. Dunn, ambassador from South Africa to El Salvador Hogo Weil, charged d'affaires from Switzerland; Mauricio Borgonovo Pohl, foreign minister of El Salvador; Eduardo Guirola, large-scale farmer; Roberto Poma, president of the government tourist agency, murdered by kidnappers before payment of ransom; Fugio Matsumoto, Japanese textile manufacturer; Raul Molina, industrialist; Nicolas Nasser, merchant and past president of the local Chamber of Commerce, and Elena de Chiurato, coffee-export executive, never released despite payment of ransom, and presumed dead.

During all these crimes, throughout this entire period of anarchy, those who now clamor to get on the human-rights bandwagon in El Salvador were silent. The naked feeling of insecurity that plagued the populace during this period produced an atmosphere of deep discouragement, humiliation and fear. People from all walks of life chose to leave El Salvador; it is estimated that emigration since 1979 exceeds half a million. Among this number are refugees in Miami, Fla., and among these are the people whom Mr. White accuses of directing the "death squads."

I think it is fitting to point out that I was kidnapped in San Salvador on Oct. 6, 1979. After my family paid a large ransom to my kidnappers. I was released, but not all in one piece. Seriously wounded during the kidnapping, and given only an occasional sip of water plus a handful of dry cornflakes every few days during my month of captivity, I was close to death. I was flown to Jackson Memorial Hospital in Miami on Nov. 5, 1979. The rebuilding of my bullet-riddled legs was then begun at Johns Hopkins Hospital in Baltimore, and my struggle to recover fully continues to this day.

While kidnappings and murders were—and remain—the stock in trade of Salvador's communist guerillas, their propaganda efforts were a key ingredient in their attempts to ensnare El Salvador and discredit its industry and its will to progress. First, public and widespread circulation was given to a statistic that the country's land and wealth was controlled by "fourteen families." This figure was so demonstrably and ridiculously inaccurate that it soon went out of vogue.

Next came energetic attacks (as prescribed by Lenin) on the "oligarchy" in a campagin to power a movement bent on the destruction of private enterprise. However, the attackers found it increasingly difficult to apply a term meaning "rule-by-a-few" to tens of thousands of entrepreneurs. The term "oligarch" soon lost currency in Salvadoran circles (though the term apparently has had a longer run among the ill-informed in the U.S.).

Finally came the horrifying specter of "right-wing death squads." Never mind the fact that communist guerrillas are responsible for many of the civilian deaths. Or that many of the politicians being murdered are conservatives. These facts do not alter the premise, says Mr. White, that civilian political murders in El Salvador are caused by right-wing death squads that are directed by Roberto d'Aubuisson and the "Miami Six." Perhaps it should be mentioned that one of Mr. White's "Six," Juan Ricardo, has been dead for more than two years. And Mr. White had to retract his indictment of another "Miami Six" member after it was proved that the man had never lived in Miami and had never been a member of the party to which Mr. White had assigned him. Mr. White also had accused this same man of having conspired to kill Archbishop Oscar Romero; it was later disclosed that the man was a personal friend of the archbishop.

As for myself, I am now living in New York City, and I am saddened by the hospitality I seem to have attracted from Mr. White. This is in direct contrast to the splendid hospitality I have found among others in the U.S. I have been received here with kindness, not only by friends, but by Americans I have met casually and unexpectedly. Above all, the compassion and sensitive humanity of the American doctors and nurses who have attended me through my long and difficult surgery and treatment has been outstanding.

The U.S., the most magnanimous country economically that the world has ever known, in all good faith makes a mistake when it attempts to transform underdeveloped countries overnight. At times, the headlong rush to sow democracy abroad, without essential understanding of the countries in which the planting is to be done, produces consequences quite the opposite of the good intended by the planters. This mistake is compounded by those who, for ideological reasons, wish to see in Central America profound social changes inimical to economic and political freedom. The Carter administration gave its support to the Sandinista movement without analyzing its makeup, and we now see that Nicaragua is a country under Soviet-Cuban rule.

All this should not leave the reader pessimistic. The will to persevere against the terrorism and anarchy that threaten to destroy El Salvador comes from the heart of the Salvadoran people. Salvadorans have proven to be impervious to the brainwashing shampoo applied to our unwilling heads by leftist intellectuals and by the tiny minority of Salvadoran Marxist.●

SALT LAKE TRIBUNE ON ELECTIONS IN EL SALVADOR

HON. STEPHEN J. SOLARZ

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 9, 1984

● Mr. SOLARZ. Mr. Speaker, I would like to share with my colleagues an editorial which appeared recently in the Salt Lake Tribune which makes an important contribution to the debate on El Salvador, as we begin consideration of the various aid requests for Central America that are pending before the Congress:

[From the Salt Lake Tribune, Mar. 28, 1984]

EL SALVADOR ELECTION TURNOUT ONLY PART OF NEEDED ANSWER

There's no question but that El Salvador can hold elections. There's considerable dispute as to whether this means its government can preserve the country for democracy.

Encouraged by what appears to have been a reasonably well-conducted national balloting in El Salvador last weekend, the White House is contending the event justifies more financial aid from the United States to Salvadoran authorities, including the military. But the vote was inconclusive and doesn't yet change much.

Official results remain unannounced, but by most accounts, no Salvadoran political party gained a ballot majority Sunday, meaning the two highest vote-getters must face off in May. Uncertainty persists, then, about how reform-minded the eventual government will be. Which throws all U.S. expectations into prolonged confusion.

Unless substantial changes occur in El Salvador, assuring a greater sharing of economic and political opportunities, the incessant guerrilla insurgency lacerating the country is apt to continue. The Reagan administration has pinned its hopes for such change on a Salvadoran government sustained by voter approval and U.S. financial aid. Critics, in Congress and elsewhere, contend the aid is unjustifiable until a government clearly protective of civil rights certifiably emerges. On that, Sunday's elections settled little.

In the first place, the turnout fell about 600,000 below expected. They were impressive, the news photos of long lines of Salvadoran voters, waiting patiently in the daytime heat for a chance to vote. However, voting is mandated by law in El Salvador. Those without an election stamp on their identity cards risk personal difficulties.

Moreover, while El Salvador's voters participated in even greater numbers two years ago, electing a constituent assembly, the amount of civil rights violations traced to the government subsequently increased. It seems, as properly intentioned as it might be, the civilian government is unable to control the Salvadoran military and police, the source of "death squads," murderers and abductors of political opponents.

Sunday's Salvadoran elections confirmed the already known fact that the country's public can and will help make democratic processes work. Not conspicuously validated, however, is the equally crucial ingredient: that the leadership eventually chosen will actually rid the central government of those elements which now make it such an inviting target for violent subversion. Lacking that, Congress should hesitate to pour more U.S. tax dollars into a forlorn cause.●

ARGENTINA'S DEBT CRISIS

HON. DENNY SMITH

OF OREGON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 9, 1984

● Mr. DENNY SMITH. Mr. Speaker, last August, 211 of us voted against the increase in the U.S. quota for the International Monetary Fund. We lost by six votes, but now the U.S. taxpayer is losing more of his hard-earned dollars to a rescue package in response to Argentina's debt crisis.

The resolution I sponsored this week, House Resolution 477, gives us an opportunity to express our opposition to any further transfer of U.S. taxpayer dollars for this purpose, without first getting the approval of Congress.

I am sure you have already read where the Federal Government is teaming up with those same U.S. banks and four Latin American countries with a rescue package for Argentina. I think it is ironic that the countries whose own loans to those U.S. banks are also unpaid.

Argentina has repeatedly failed to abide by the conditions and austerity measures set forth by the IMF, and serious doubts exist as to the country's future ability to make interest and principal payments. How long are we going to put off the day of reckoning?

We just gave the IMF an $8.4 billion increase in our quota; and yet, it appears that action has done little to resolve the economic situation in Latin America. Argentina owes $43.6 billion, and their interest on the majority of these loans is unpaid since December 31. The rescue package, composed of $500 million for Argentina to make interest payments, is strictly to bail out the New York banks since the large banks seem to panic when faced with the idea of declaring large loans as "nonperforming." You certainly would not see banks give this white-glove treatment to our farmers, small businessmen, and other needy Americans who are losing their properties through foreclosure by the very institutions who are asking for these taxpayers' help.

The U.S. taxpayer should not be called upon to absorb the losses and guarantee a profit for the investor-owned New York banks. It is those banks' responsibility to negotiate with Argentina. This type of raid on the U.S. Treasury cannot continue.

I thought the following article which appeared in Newsweek magazine might be of interest to you.

[From Newsweek, Apr. 9, 1984]

ARGENTINA GETS A QUICK FIX

Red alert on the foreign debt, screamed the headline in the Buenos Aires Crónica, and indeed, the fuse on the international-debt bomb burned dangerously short last week. The government of Argentine President Raúl Alfonsín was hanging tough in its negotiations with creditors over an austerity plan and payments on its $43.6 billion international debt, the world's third largest. But the proximate cause of the tension was Finance Minister Bernardo Grinspun's threat to ignore a March 31 deadline. Failure to pay at least $500 million in interest by that date would have put many of its loans more than 90 days in arrears and forced a number of American banks to take large cuts in first-quarter earnings. Both Argentina and the banks seemed ready to let the crisis escalate. But then a solution arrived from a most unlikely source: a group of four Latin nations, three of them with major debt problems of their own.

The latest quick fix in the two-year-old debt crisis was as complicated as it was surprising. Brazil, Mexico, Venezuela and Colombia agreed to advance Argentina $300 million; a group of commercial banks will provide an additional $100 million. With that money and $100 million from its own reserves, Argentina will pay its overdue interest to U.S. banks, keeping its interest payments up to date. At the same time, Argentina will continue to negotiate with the International Monetary Fund on a long-term plan for stabilizing its economy. When an agreement is reached, the IMF will authorize new credit. Washington plays its own role in the rescue. As soon as Argentina and the IMF come to terms, the Treasury will give Buenos Aires a $300 million bridge loan to tide it over until the IMF-authorized cash starts to flow. Argentina will use that money to repay its Latin neighbors.

Three of the countries aiding Argentina are themselves bent double with debt: Brazil ($93 billion), Mexico ($86 billion) and Venezuela ($34 billion). Why are they risking money on a country that is an economic basket case? Mexico, which pushed for the joint action, may have had the most to gain. Many banks have withdrawn from a big Mexican loan package, and the country feared there would be more dropouts in future borrowings if the Argentine situation worsened. Apparently, others thought they had to act to prop up the fragile framework of international cooperation and trust that has supported their own economies.

Survival: Their generosity was unusual for another reason: Argentina actually has enough cash on hand to meet its current financial obligations. Fattened by strong grain exports, its treasury is thought to hold $1 billion or more in foreign-exchange reserves. But Argentina's leaders want to use that money to strengthen the domestic economy—and ensure the survival of their government—rather than to pay back debts incurred by the right-wing dictatorship they replaced.

That logic has become a central part of Argentina's bargaining position. If the industrialized nations are eager to see Argentina's infant democracy survive, the argument goes, they must be prepared to offer less onerous repayment terms. By the same token, President Alfonsín believes that domestic political pressures make it impossible for him to accept the IMF's stringent austerity measures. One advantage of the new scheme is that with Latin money on the line, Alfonsín may find it easier to sell a harsh IMF program at home.

Intensifying the crisis was the unspoken threat of outright debt repudiation. Most bankers, however, are still writing off that possibility. Argentina's self-sufficiency in food and energy would allow it to survive for a short time in the state of economic quarantine that would follow such repudiation. Still, given the difficulty Argentina would have conducting trade in the aftermath, it would slowly start to sink into desperate poverty. And, however popular the move would be domestically, debt repudiation would cripple Argentina's international standing, which Alfonsín has been working to rebuild.

As spectacular as it was, the emergency operation last week was little more than a Band-Aid. Alfonsín still faces the task of negotiating an agreement with the IMF, maintaining political stability and meeting Argentina's financial obligations, all at the same time. But there was at least one hopeful sign inherent in last week's rescue: everyone seemed to realize that the health of the world financial system is so precarious that even a minor infection could turn out to be fatal.●

CENTRAL AMERICA

HON. MAJOR R. OWENS

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 9, 1984

● Mr. OWENS. Mr. Speaker, while we still have the opportunity, we must cut off all programs and funding which perpetuate American military intervention in Central America.

Over the past months, we have set a dangerous precedent by the full-scale invasion of the island nation of Grenada. We have suffered the loss of hundreds of our young men in an airport outside Beirut. We have angered the people of Europe by our deployment of missiles throughout their countryside. We have threatened the very future of our world by bringing nuclear arms negotiations to a complete halt.

These are the outcomes of the administration's militarist approach to foreign affairs. This approach has been tested and found wanting. It has been, and will be, a total failure.

This same emphasis on military confrontation threatens a tragic disaster in Central America. Despite congressional attempts to limit provocative actions, our troops are active throughout the region and our battleships are poised off the coast of Nicaragua. Our Nation is helping to spread terror among the people of Central America.

If we accept the administration's blueprints for action, Central America will become another scenario of U.S. intervention, embarassment, and death. It is our responsibility to protect our Nation's honor and principles, and to bring our troops home before they become the victims, or perpetrators, of further violence.

America is strong. That strength carries with it the burden of restraint and moderation. That strength is the product of a democracy, which can best be spread by example and by economic and social support of democratic movements throughout the world.●

THE 100TH ANNIVERSARY OF GERMAN BROWN TROUT PLANTING IN U.S.A.

HON. GUY VANDER JAGT

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 9, 1984

● Mr. VANDER JAGT. Mr. Speaker, it will be my great honor this Saturday April 14, to join with hundreds of others in a very special 100th anniversary of the original introduction of German Brown Trout (Salmo Fario) into American waters. What great thrills, great experiences have taken place in these past 100 years of trout fishing by literally millions of our sports fishermen because Baron Frederick Von Behr, president of the Deutschen Fischerei Verein in Berlin, agreed to send a second shipment of 70,000 brown trout eggs in 1884 after a first shipment of 80,000 eggs in 1883 resulted in no plantings since so few of those eggs were hatched.

History buffs will enjoy a report filed as "Miscellaneous Documents No. 68 of the United States House of Representatives" in 1884 which contained the following:

On February 18 (1884), we received a case of 5,000 eggs of German Trout (Salmo Fario) which arrived in good condition. They hatched about the middle of March and were taken April 11 in Car No. 2 and planted in a branch of the Pere Marquette River in Northern Michigan.

The distinction of being the cradle stream in North America of the brown trout, therefore, belongs to the historic Pere Marquette River located in Michigan's Ninth Congressional District. That first planting took place in the Pere Marquette River near Baldwin, MI, in Lake County.

As I mentioned earlier, on Saturday, in cooperation with the Shrine of the Pines Society located in Lake County and several other Baldwin-area organizations, the West Michigan Chapter of the Trout Unlimited is organizing a beautiful and meaningful observance of the original introduction of brown trout in our country. A Michigan historical marker will be erected on the grounds of the Shrine of the Pines along the banks of the Pere Marquette River.

It will be my privilege to be a part of these ceremonies along with many others, including Baldwin Village President Delbert White; Jon P. Bachelder, president of Trout Unlimited; Ben J. Myler, of Ludington; John R. Luton, Izaak Walton League of America; and representatives from the Michigan Department of Natural Resources; the U.S. Forest Service; delegates from the Federation of Fly Fishers, Michigan United Conservation Club; and local, county, State, and Federal elective officials.

It is truly going to be a milestone observance, another in the great history of Lake County and the Pere Marquette River, a stream whose recorded history dates back to the death of its namesake, French missionary Pere Jacques Marquette on the shore of the river in 1675.

The Baldwin Chamber of Commerce, deeply involved in this great day, also will host a luncheon capping off the observance.

At this time, Mr. Speaker, I would like to conclude this special presentation of the German Brown Trout with newspaper articles from the Manistee News Advocate, Manistee, MI, of January 27, 1984, entitled "Trout Unlimited to Honor Brown Trout," and the February 27, 1984 story from the Lake County Star in Baldwin, MI, headlined "Trout Centennial April 14."

The newspaper articles follows:

From the Manistee (MI) News Advocate, Jan. 27, 1984]

TROUT UNLIMITED TO HONOR BROWN TROUT

(By Greg Gielczyk)

BALDWIN.—Much has been written during the year past commemorating the arrival of the German Brown Trout (Salmo Farlo) on the American shores Feb. 23, 1883, however, little has been said about the introduction of the species into American waters.

Documents written by Fred Mather, superintendent of the U.S. Fish Station at Cold Spring Harbor on Long Island, N.Y., reveal that the first shipment of 80,000 brown trout eggs from Baron Frederick Von Behr, president of the Deutschen Fischerei Verein in Berlin, resulted in no plantings since so few of the eggs were hatched.

It was from the second shipment of 70,000 eggs arriving at Cold Spring Harbor on Feb. 15, 1884, that the first planting of the species (known in Germany as Bachforille) was made.

Mather divided his shipment with, among others, Frank N. Clark, superintendent of the U.S. Fish Station at Northville, Mich., whose report in Miscellaneous Documents No. 68 of the U.S. House of Representatives in 1884 contained the following. "On Feb. 18, we received a case of 5,000 eggs of German Trout (Salmo Fario) which arrived in good condition." "They hatched about the middle of March and were taken April 11 in Car No. 2 and planted in a branch of the Pere Marquette River in Northern Michigan."

The distinction of being the cradle stream in North America of the brown trout, therefore, belongs to the historic Pere Marquette River, a stream whose recorded history dates back to the death of its namesake, the French missionary, Pere Jacques Marquette, on the shore of the river in 1675.

In cooperation, with the Shrine of the Pines Society and several other Baldwin area organizations, the West Michigan Chapter of Trout Unlimited is organizing a centennial observance of the original introduction of Brown Trout in North American waters, to be held April 14, at Baldwin.

A Michigan historical marker will be erected on the grounds of the Shrine of the Pines along the Pere Marquette River, followed by a luncheon at the Baldwin High School.

TROUT CENTENNIAL APRIL 14

BALDWIN.—Much has been written during the past year commemorating the arrival of the German Brown Trout (Salmo Fario) on the American shores Feb. 23, 1883. However, little has been said about the actual introduction of the species into American waters.

Documents written by Fred Mather, superintendent of the U.S. Fish Station at Cold Springs Harbor on Long Island, New York, reveal that the first shipment of 80,000 brown trout eggs from Baron Frederick Von Behr, president of the Deutschen Fischerei Verein in Berlin, resulted in no plantings since so few of the eggs were hatched.

It was from the second shipment of 70,000 eggs arriving at Cold Springs Harbor on Feb. 15, 1884, that the first planting of the species—known in Germany as Bachforille—was made. Mather divided his shipment with, among others, Frank N. Clark, superintendent of the U.S. Fish Station at Northville in Wayne County, whose report in Miscellaneous Documents No 68 of the U.S. House of Representatives in 1884 contained the following:

"On February 18, we received a case of 5,000 eggs of German Trout (Salmo Fario) which arrived in good condition. They hatched about the middle of March and were taken April 11 in Car No. 2 and planted in a branch of the Pere Marquette River in Northern Michigan."

The distinction of being the cradle steam in North America of the brown trout, therefore, belongs to the historic Pere Marquette River, a stream whose recorded history dates back to the death of its namesake. French missionary Pere Jacques Marquette, on the shore of the river in 1675.

In cooperation with the Shrine of the Pines Society and several other Baldwin-area organizations. The West Michigan Chapter of Trout Unlimited is organizing a centennial observance of the original introduction of brown trout in North American waters to be held April 14 in Baldwin.

A Michigan historical marker will be erected on the grounds of the Shrine of the Pines along the banks of the Pere Marquette River, followed by a luncheon at Baldwin High School. Several hundred persons are expected for the ceremonies, including top officials from the Department of Natural Resources, the U.S. Forest Service, and state and federal elected representatives. Delegates from the Federation of Fly Fishers, Michigan United Conservation Clubs, Izaac Walton League and other groups are expected to attend, as well as representatives from the media and outdoor writers organizations.

For further information. contact B.J. Myler, 124 South James Street, Ludington. 845-5144. Luncheon tickets at $7.50 each are available from the Baldwin Area Chamber of Commerce 745-3995, or by writing the West Michigan Chapter, Trout Unlimited, P.O. Box 8473 Grand Rapids, MI.●

TRIBUTE TO AN OUTSTANDING COMMUNITY BOARD CHAIRMAN: HAROLD FALLICK

HON. STEPHEN J. SOLARZ

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 9, 1984

● Mr. SOLARZ. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to Harold Fallick, the outgoing chairman of Community Board 13, for his many years of dedicated community service.

Mr. Fallick has been an active member of the community board for the past 7 years, serving on numerous committees and giving countless hours of service for the betterment of his neighbors and his community. Four years ago, he took on the additional responsibilities inherent in the position of chairman of the community board and distinguished himself in the capacity through his strong, determined leadership and exemplary dedication to duty.

However, Harold Fallick is much more than a dedicated community board member and officer. He has been an active member of the Community Democratic Club for many years, and is an active member of both the B'nai B'rith Oceanview Lodge and the Knights of Pythias Lodge 699.

Harold Fallick also served for many years as the trustee of the Oceanview Jewish Center. He is a member of the Society of Naval Architects & Marine Engineers and an ex-officer with the Merchant Marines. He also served his country with honor in both World War II and the Korean war.

Harold Fallick represents the best kind of community activist; one who gives tirelessly of himself for the betterment of his country and his community.

I am indeed honored and proud to count Harold Fallick as one of the leaders of the Shorefront community and wish to congratulate him on the occasion of the dinner—taking place on April 12, 1984 at the Palms Shore Club—in his honor.●

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES—Tuesday, April, 10, 1984

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Rev. Albin Sowinski, St. Helen's Catholic Church, Milwaukee, Wis., offered the following prayer:

Father of all mankind, we offer You prayers of praise and thanksgiving. You have fashioned us into a nation as our fathers envisioned us, where people may live in peace, justice, equality, and freedom.

Father, we ask You to bless our country and this world with peace that is a reality—where all people see You as our common Father and each other as brothers in loving care for each other's needs and sharing each other's abundance.

Father, give us a moral sense of justice and equality for all on which our country was founded.

Father, give us the true freedom we long for: That our poor may be free from hunger, that our wealthy be free from indifference. May our aging citizens be free of neglect and loneliness, our young free of selfishness. May the weak live free of oppression and the strong live free of power that enslaves.

Father, bless and enlighten our President, our Congress, and all civil officials to guide this Nation with vision to continue to be the greatest country on Earth where peace, justice, equality, and freedom truly reign in the hearts of all who enjoy its security.

Father, we ask this in Your name.

THE JOURNAL

The SPEAKER. The Chair has examined the Journal of the last day's proceedings and announces to the House his approval thereof.

Pursuant to clause 1, rule I, the Journal stands approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. Saunders, one of his secretaries.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate by Mr. Sparrow, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment a bill of the House of the following title:

H.R. 4169. An act to provide for reconciliation pursuant to section 3 of the first concurrent resolution on the budget for the fiscal year 1984.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed a concurrent resolution of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House is requested:

S. Con. Res. 102. Concurrent resolution to correct the enrollment of H.R. 4169.

COMMUNICATION FROM THE CLERK OF THE HOUSE

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication from the Clerk of the House of Representatives:

WASHINGTON, D.C.,
April 9, 1984.

Hon. THOMAS P. O'NEILL, Jr.,
The Speaker, House of Representatives, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. SPEAKER: I have the honor to transmit herewith a copy of the Certificate of Election received from Mr. Kevin J. Kennedy, Executive Secretary of the Wisconsin State Board of Elections, indicating that the Honorable Gerald D. Kleczka was elected to the Office of Representative in Congress from the Fourth District of Wisconsin in a Special Election held on April 3, 1984.

With kind regards, I am,

Sincerely,

BENJAMIN J. GUTHRIE,
Clerk, House of Representatives.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA

STATE OF WISCONSIN,
Elections Board, ss:

I, Kevin J. Kennedy, Executive Secretary of the State Elections Board of the State of Wisconsin, do hereby certify that the following candidate was elected Representative in Congress, at the Special Election, held in the state of Wisconsin, on the first Tuesday in April, 1984, being the Third day of said month, as appears from the statement of the Board of State Canvassers, now on file and of record in the Office of the State Elections Board:

Congressional district: Fourth.
Elected: Gerald D. Kleczka.

SWEARING IN OF THE HONORABLE GERALD D. KLECZKA OF WISCONSIN AS A MEMBER OF THE HOUSE

The SPEAKER. Will the dean of the Wisconsin delegation (Mr. KASTENMEIER) kindly bring forth the newly elected Member to the rostrum?

Mr. KLECZKA appeared at the bar of the House and took the oath of office.

The SPEAKER. Congratulations. You are a Member of the Congress of the United States.

EXPRESSIONS OF APPRECIATION AS NEWLY ELECTED MEMBER OF CONGRESS

(Mr. KLECZKA asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. KLECZKA. Mr. Speaker, I thank you for the chance to address the House on this very special occasion.

I would like to express my appreciation to my distinguished colleagues from Wisconsin for joining me today. I would also like to thank the Reverend Albin Sowinski of St. Helen's Parish, Milwaukee, Wis., for offering such comforting words and for traveling to the Capitol for this memorable day.

Mr. Speaker, I am honored to join this distinguished body. I look forward to working with my colleagues as we debate and decide the important challenges that our country faces in the years ahead.

IN MEMORY OF THE HONORABLE PHILLIP BURTON

(Mr. EDWARDS of California asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. EDWARDS of California. Mr. Speaker, 1 year ago today this House lost one of its most esteemed, most effective, most vibrant Members. I refer, of course, to Phil Burton.

I know I speak for all of us in the California Democratic delegation when I say not a day has passed that we have not thought of Phil and missed his insight, his passion, his absolute glee at jumping into the thick of some legislative foray—his delight at fighting for the powerless in our society. I cannot think of anyone who more relished the work of a Congressperson than our dear friend, Phil.

How much he would have contributed to our deliberations of the past year. How much we could have used his wisdom.

So, we miss Phil deeply and always will. And we are diminished by his absence. Yet we are grateful to have SALA as a Member of the House and as a member of the California delegation. In the time she has been one of our colleagues, SALA has shown us that she, too, has significant contributions to make to this body and to our country. We are lucky to have her here with us.

CORRECTING ENROLLMENT OF H.R. 4169, OMNIBUS BUDGET RECONCILIATION ACT OF 1983

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the Senate concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 102) directing the Clerk of the House to make corrections in the enrollment of H.R. 4169, and ask for its immediate consideration in the House.

I might say, Mr. Speaker, that this request has been cleared with the gentleman from Arkansas (Mr. HAMMERSCHMIDT) of the minority party and the ranking member on the Committee on Veterans' Affairs.

The Clerk read the title of the Senate concurrent resolution.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the Senate concurrent resolution, as follows:

S. CON. RES. 102

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That in the enrollment of H.R. 4169, the Clerk of the House of Representatives is directed to make the correction as follows: strike title IV.

The Senate concurrent resolution was concurred in.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

REMOVAL OF NAME OF MEMBER AS COSPONSOR OF H.R. 4098

Mr. MAVROULES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that my name be removed from the list of cosponsors of H.R. 4098.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

THE PRESIDENT SHOULD THANK CONGRESS FOR GETTING THE MARINES OUT OF BEIRUT

(Mr. MAVROULES asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. MAVROULES. Mr. Speaker, twice in the last week, I watched with amazement as the President attempted to rewrite the history of his foreign policy.

The President is correct in one area only. Congress did take the responsibility and forced the disengagement of our marines from a defenseless mission in Beirut.

In good conscience, Mr. Reagan cannot blame Congress for his policy failures in Lebanon. It is only necessary to review the published comments of former Secretary of State Haig to understand. Our marines in Beirut, restricted in their activities, were the tragic symbol of a diplomatic policy which never existed.

The administration may feel that "military strength is a definite part of diplomacy." Thankfully, we, in this body, know it is not a substitute in Central America, the Middle East, or anywhere else in the world.

Mr. President, be honest. Do not blame Congress. Thank us for getting you out of Lebanon.

A FEDERAL RESPONSE TO THE GRIEVOUS PROBLEM OF MISSING CHILDREN

(Mr. WILLIAMS of Montana asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. WILLIAMS of Montana. Mr. Speaker, America has a grievous problem—missing children. Last year, 1,500,000 children were missing from their homes. Most of those were children who had run away and eventually were returned safely to their homes. However, 20,000 to 50,000 cases a year of missing children are unresolved.

Each year, 150,000 children in this country are abducted. Two-thirds of them are abducted by an estranged or divorced parent but 40,000 or 50,000 children are abducted by strangers. And each year we find 4,000 of those children, dead. This Congress will soon have an opportunity to develop a Federal response to this problem and I urge us to do so at the earliest possible time.

PRESIDENT SHOULD STOP COVERT ACTIVITIES

(Mrs. KENNELLY asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend her remarks.)

Mrs. KENNELLY. Mr. Speaker, it is time for the administration to stop talking about covert activities in Nicaragua. The word "covert" signifies secret, and clearly the whole world knows our secret; we are mining harbors in Nicaragua to the detriment of ships from other nations, including our allies.

Up until now, the United States has always been a leader in supporting international law. Today, I urge my colleagues to speak out on the administration's actions. It is not just covert activity that needs to be debated; it is the public policy behind it that must be examined. The American people should have the chance to say whether they are for this policy or against it; whether they are for or against the strong possibility of U.S. involvement in a war in Central America. I urge my colleagues to oppose this so-called covert activity. A vote against it will assure the world that the United States still stands by its principles and its respect for international law.

THE PRESIDENT SHOULD REDISCOVER PRINCIPLES OF THE FOUNDING FATHERS

(Mr. ALEXANDER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, the President and Secretary of State have recently criticized Congress for objecting to this administration's foreign policy. The objections are pointed at the failure of the administration's policy in Lebanon and its continued support of an 18,000-man counterrevolutionary army created to overthrow the Government of Nicaragua as well as the covert mining of the harbor in Nicaragua which is allegedly directed by the CIA.

The Reagan administration's policy in Central America is in defiance of American public opinion and congressional authorization.

The President has forgotten one very important justification for America's declaration of independence from England. I refer to a phrase of the Declaration of Independence which criticized George III:

> He, at this time, is transporting large armies of foreign mercenaries to complete the works of death, desolation, defiance and tyranny, already begun, with circumstances of cruelty and perfidy, scarcely paralleled in the most barbarous ages and totally unworthy of the head of a civilized nation.

Mr. President, perhaps you should rediscover the principles of our own Founding Fathers, the principle of territorial integrity of sovereign nations and the right of self-determination.

ADMINISTRATION'S VIOLATIONS OF INTERNATIONAL LAW WEAKEN U.S. ABILITY TO BOLSTER DEMOCRACY IN CENTRAL AMERICA

(Mr. GLICKMAN asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. GLICKMAN. Mr. Speaker, I have been among those who have supported a balanced package of economic and military aid to El Salvador. We have a clear and legitimate role to play in bolstering democracy and fostering a stable environment in Central America. It is clear, however that the recent disclosures of CIA mining of Nicaraguan harbors in violation of principles of international law destroys our ability to play any constructive role whatsoever in that region.

What the United States has done, supposedly as a "holding action" until after the 1984 Presidential elections, gains us absolutely nothing, but it does cost us greatly. This downright stupid act distracts world attention from Sandinista interference in El Salvador and shifts the focus to these illicit and illegal acts of our own CIA. It destroys our credibility and makes it next to impossible for us to expect principles of international law and the moral pressures of the world community to be brought to bear against destabilizing forces in the region when we choose, ourselves, to flagrantly violate principles of international law.

Before we lose all credibility, the President should order an immediate cessation of the mining. On this one, the Congress should force him to do so.

MINING OF NICARAGUA'S HARBORS PAVING THE WAY FOR A U.S. WAR IN CENTRAL AMERICA

(Mr. BONIOR of Michigan asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. BONIOR of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, by refusing to accept the jurisdiction of the World Court in the next 2 years on any cases arising from U.S. actions in Central America, the Reagan administration has acknowledged that it is engaged in a legally indefensible policy, a policy, in fact, of state-supported terrorism.

The construction of permanent military facilities in Honduras, the extensive military maneuvers, the introduction of U.S. troops into areas of hostility in El Salvador, and, now, the mining of Nicaragua's harbors are paving the way for a U.S. war in Central America.

Today, it is the House of Representatives alone that stands as barrier to that war.

I am proud that a majority of this body has voted twice to stop funding the CIA-sponsored war against Nicaragua. And I urge the House to stand by its convictions, and reject any funds for a policy that is branding this Nation as an international outlaw.

REAGAN ADMINISTRATION'S DOUBLE STANDARD ON INTERNATIONAL LAW

(Mr. BONKER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. BONKER. Mr. Speaker, recent disclosures in the press about the CIA's direct involvement in the mining of Nicaragua's harbors is yet another example of questionable behavior in this administration's conduct of foreign policy. The refusals by the top administration officials to deny these reports and the President's decision to suspend the World Court's jurisdiction as it applies to United States-Central America relations in the coming 2 years only confirmed the worst fears many of us share about the Reagan administration's intentions toward this region and Nicaragua in particular.

Last week the President lamented the lack of bipartisan foreign policy. But how can he expect a bipartisan support so long as he acts in this manner? Where the administration perceives its interests will benefit, as in denouncing Soviet violations of international human rights conventions, the President champions the cause of international law. But where international law is viewed as an obstacle rather than as a system designed to promote the peaceful resolution of differences between states, the administration simply exempts itself.

Nowhere is this double standard more apparent than in the administration's policy toward Nicaragua and the rest of Central America.

THE LATEST OUTRAGE

(Mrs. BOXER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend her remarks.)

Mrs. BOXER. Mr. Speaker, we have an Army and a Navy and Marine Corps. But our President creates his own private army—the CIA directing the Contras whose aim is to overthrow the Nicaraguan Government. The President says that overthrowing is not his aim, yet we supply these Contras although this House has voted twice to cease that covert war.

The latest outrage is our CIA army planting explosives in the seas surrounding Nicaragua, and, in anticipation of a legal challenge in the World Court, the Reagan administration announces that it will not be bound by the Court decision.

What kind of country are we becoming?

Are we so unsure of ourselves as a model of freedom that we must resort to covert force?

Is our new slogan "America, love it or fear it?" instead of "the land of the free and the home of the brave?"

I am appalled and ashamed of our cowardly behavior, waging a secret war, endangering lives at sea, and refusing to stand up to world scrutiny. Our allies are ashamed too.

The President blames the Congress for interfering with his military exploits. I say thank God we do.

CLEVELAND—THE ALL-AMERICAN CITY

(Ms. OAKAR asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend her remarks.)

Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Speaker, I am proud that yesterday the city of Cleveland, Ohio, which I represent, won the All-America City Award, an honor coveted by many cities.

Cleveland was one of nine cities to win this award.

Cleveland is a great place to live, has the finest hospitals, a rich cultural center, the Cleveland Symphony Orchestra, art museum. The oldest repertory theater in the country, the Cleveland Playhouse, the Cleveland Ballet, Karamu House, and others. It is a diverse industrial base and has a great water supply.

But most important are its people, a mosaic of cultures, proud of their heritage, proud of their city. Truly it is an all-American city and I am proud to represent it.

A BILL TO END UNFAIR TREATMENT OF WIDOWED SOCIAL SECURITY RECIPIENTS

(Mr. MORRISON of Connecticut asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. MORRISON of Connecticut. Mr. Speaker, today I have introduced legislation to relieve the anxiety, embarrassment, and hardship felt by too many of our Nation's senior citizens as a result of the Federal procedures used to collect social security and SSI payments made to deceased beneficiaries and received by their surviving spouses.

Let me share with you just one of the experiences of social security recipients in Connecticut's Third Congressional District with these arbitrary and unfair procedures.

Mrs. Alphena Breault, of West Haven, Conn., and her husband were both social security recipients at the time that Mr. Breault died. Mrs. Breault promptly notified the Social Security Administration of his death. While waiting for her widow's benefits to be processed, she received several checks in her husband's name. A Social Security employee advised her that she should deposit those checks in her checking account to use for her living expenses—her own monthly retirement benefits were only $87.25 per month—and that her account would be adjusted later on.

Many months later, that "adjustment" came all at once and without warning. The entire amount of her husband's checks was suddenly taken out of her bank account. The only notice that Mrs. Breault received was when she was told by her car mechanic that the check she had written to him for repair work had bounced.

I know of many other social security recipients in my district who have had similar experiences. Social security checks are regularly sent out after beneficiaries die, even when the Social Security Administration has prompt notice of the death of these persons. Later, however, when the bureaucracy catches up, Social Security will recoup the payments through a process known as "reclamation": Social Security notifies the Treasury Department, which instructs the bank which cashed the checks or received them through direct deposit to debit the depositor's account.

Neither Social Security nor Treasury gives prior notice of the recoupment action. Nor is the depositor afforded the opportunity to negotiate a repayment schedule or to request a waiver of the recoupment in cases of special hardship. Social Security maintains that these rights, which are required in all cases of overpayment, do not apply because these payments are not overpayments, but "erroneous" payments.

Mrs. Breault was one of the plaintiffs in a class action suit in the U.S. Federal District Court in Connecticut, Breault against Heckler, which challenged these procedures on the ground that they violate the overpayment provision of the Social Security Act. U.S. Magistrate Arthur Lattimer has ruled in the plaintiffs' favor. I understand that other Federal courts have reached similar conclusions. Nevertheless, the reclamation procedures are still followed in parts of the country where they have not been forbidden by the courts.

My bill would amend the definition of overpayment in the Social Security Act to make it clear that Congress intends the procedural protections afforded to social security and SSI recipients who receive overpayments to be afforded to surviving spouses who receive the benefit payments of their deceased spouses. If adopted, my bill would require that prior to any collection action, Social Security must first ascertain whether the person who received the payment is a surviving spouse entitled to social security or SSI. If so, it would be limited to the methods for recovery of overpayment authorized in the Social Security Act and would be required to extend the waiver provisions of the act to such person. The surviving spouse would receive notice of the recovery action and have an opportunity to establish a repayment schedule or to seek waiver in cases of special hardship.

Mr. Speaker, Congress intended that all social security and SSI recipients who are overpaid by mistake should be afforded the fundamental rights of prior notice, a fair repayment schedule, and waiver in cases of special hardship. The Social Security Administration is using bureaucratic doubletalk to get around that intent and deprive recently widowed recipients—a category of people who should be afforded, if anything, greater, not lesser, protections—of these fundamental rights. We need to put a stop to this outrageous abuse of the dignity and well-being of our senior citizens.

THE MARKETPLACE HAS SPOKEN ON THE BUDGET

(Mr. ROEMER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. ROEMER. Mr. Speaker, many House Members—I am one—believe in the economic justice found in the marketplace.

Social Darwinism and laissez-faire economics usually work together to produce the most good for the most people in the most efficient manner possible.

Now, all things are relative. Water boils at different temperatures depending on altitude. Free market economics is not perfect, nor is it always the best for each individual. But relative to the speed, efficiency, and justice of Government decisionmaking, the free marketplace is a winner.

What did the marketplace tell us about last week's budget? Within 48 hours after budget passage the prime rate was up one-half point to 12 percent. The Fed discount rate was raised to 9 percent, the first increase in nearly a year and a half and the stock market hit a new low for the year.

Any budget that manages $1 out of every $4 in America is extremely important. It affects interest rates, economic growth, job opportunities, quality of life, health, and safety.

The marketplace has spoken on this important budget and it is not good news. The market says, "We expected more. We deserved better."

I agree.

THE REAGAN ADMINISTRATION TAKING ANOTHER STEP IN MILITARIZING CENTRAL AMERICA

(Mrs. COLLINS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend her remarks.)

Mrs. COLLINS. Mr. Speaker, everyday, we see the Reagan administration taking another step in militarizing Central America. The slow but steady pace of the increases in military assistance, the number of advisors and the size of the maneuvers tends to blur the intensity of the buildup which is clearly taking place.

However, yesterday's announcement that the administration holds itself the law in its involvement in the mining of ports in Nicaragua is a shocking admission of guilt. I cannot help but believe that if any other country was doing the mining, we would call it an act of war.

We must stop attacking a sovereign country, an impoverished nation left bankrupt by a despotic family we helped put and kept in power for so long. If we do not say no now, I am afraid that we will find out why Reagan wants to exempt himself from international law, not just for these recent incidents, but for the whole next 2 years.

ADMINISTRATION'S POLICY IN CENTRAL AMERICA

(Mr. MARKEY asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. MARKEY. Mr. Speaker, occupants of the Oval Office used to say, "The buck stops here." Not Ronald Reagan. When it is time to take responsibility for the failure of his half-baked foreign policies, he points the finger at Congress. When you look at his policy in Central America, it is no wonder.

What sort of policy do we have?

CIA mining of international shipping.

Bombing of oil facilities.

U.S. airplanes flying combat support intelligence missions in El Salvador.

Reports of a secret plan to send American troops into combat.

Open contempt for international law.

And today we are told that this is just a holding action until after the elections in November. Is Ronald Reagan going to give America a new role in the world? Instead of being the world's policeman, are we now going to be the world's outlaw?

Mr. Speaker, it is time for Ronald Reagan to come clean with the American people. Today, I am introducing a resolution of inquiry directing the President to tell us just what he is up to in Central America. And it is time for us in Congress to stop President Reagan's reckless, irresponsible war against Nicaragua. We must vote now, as we have twice in the past, to end this lawless policy before it goes any further.

THE HEIGHTS OF HYPOCRISY

(Mr. RITTER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. RITTER. Mr. Speaker, is it not the height of hypocrisy for the Marxist Nicaraguan leaders to take a case to the World Court against those whose only demand is for the Nicaraguan Government to live up to promises made about freedom, human rights, and nonintervention.

Is it not the height of hypocrisy for the Marxist Nicaraguans who along with their Cuban and Soviet bloc comrades "command and control" the destruction of bridges, roads, telephone lines, and electric power facilities, and so many other people targets in El Salvador to publicly bemoan Nicaraguan revolutionaries for doing the same to them?

Is it not the height of hypocrisy for totalitarian Sandinistas to decry our military assistance, when they have undergone a vast Soviet-sponsored military buildup? A buildup that may amount to the sharpest rise in war-making capacity in the history of Latin America. A buildup which began while we were providing them with substantial financial assistance. Well before the Contras got started.

And who, may we ask, are those we are helping in Nicaragua? They are unquestionably forces seeking to democratize their country and reverse its inexorable slide toward totalitarianism. They are unquestionably those seeking to reduce the massive Soviet, Cuban bloc militarization of their country and to protect Central America from Communist dominance. For that, we, the American people, should be grateful to them. For their patriotism and their battle for freedom is a battle that we will not have to wage, if they are successful.

THE PRESIDENT'S FOREIGN POLICY IN CENTRAL AMERICA

(Mr. GEKAS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. GEKAS. Mr. Speaker, I am assured that the litany of remarks that we heard today in criticism of the President and his efforts to stabilize Central America are an effort to divert attention from some of the successes of this administration in foreign policy.

Where has it gone, this precious theme of ours, of uniting behind the President of the United States, as we did behind President Carter in Camp David, as we did behind Lyndon Johnson in Vietnam, as we did behind President Nixon to end the war in Vietnam? Where is this age-old confident way that the American people stand behind the President of the United States in items of foreign policy?

What motivation can the President of the United States have in trying to help the situation in Central America except to protect our borders, to protect the interests of American democracy, to help the friends of the United States of America?

For speaker after speaker to stand up here and condemn the President of the United States is to condemn the American way of helping secure its borders and to help its friends in the Western Hemisphere.

ARGENTINA'S DEBT CRISIS

(Mr. DENNY SMITH asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. DENNY SMITH. Mr. Speaker, whoever said there is "no free lunch," never came to the public trough where the New York banks feed.

I have introduced a resolution which will block the latest raid on the Treasury through a rescue package to respond to Argentina's debt crisis. I think it is ironic that the Latin countries promoting this package are the same countries that have unpaid loans owed to U.S. banks.

Serious doubts exist as to Argentina's future ability to even make interest payments. How long are we going to put off the day of reckoning?

New York's Wall Street talks of financial disaster. If they want to see disaster, they should come to Oregon's Main Streets and watch the number of farmers, small businessmen, lumber-mill workers, and others who are seeing their hopes and dreams fade while the banks foreclose on loans.

These are the very taxpayers who are then called upon to pay for the New York bankers' bad judgment. The taxpayers should not be expected to absorb the banks' losses and guarantee them a profit.

LINE-ITEM VETO AND BALANCED BUDGET CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENTS

(Mr. MACK asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. MACK. Mr. Speaker, last week we listened to a lot of discussion about the budget, and we were constantly reminded that we needed to vote for a budget resolution that, No. 1, would be able to be passed, and, No. 2, would be carried out.

A few minutes ago I listened to the gentleman from Louisiana who said that the free market has responded to what we did last week, and I think he is quite right. The interesting thing is, I just had the opportunity to take a look at the reconciliation package, and I might be a little bit early, but it appears to me that it is calling for an increase in spending in 1985 of $400 million. Maybe I am a little early. We will just have to wait and see. We will vote on that on Thursday.

But because of those reasons, Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask unanimous consent to offer a request calling for consideration of a line-item veto constitutional amendment and a balanced budget amendment.

The Chair has ruled that in order to make the request I must have the clearance of the majority and the minority leadership. This request has been cleared by the minority leadership. I would now yield to a spokesman from the majority leadership for an appropriate clearance.

Apparently there will be none.

A BIPARTISAN FOREIGN POLICY

(Mr. WRIGHT asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, as one who for 30 years has consistently supported the principles of a bipartisan foreign policy while working with seven American Presidents, four of the opposition party, I call upon President Reagan today to desist from the harsh partisan rhetoric which is so thoroughly destructive to the goals of a bipartisan foreign policy.

For the President to blame Congress for the failures of his policy in Lebanon is not only dishonest and unfair; it is counterproductive to any effort that he might expect from Congress to work with him on other foreign policy goals.

The truth is that Congress bent over backward to cooperate with the President on Lebanon. We deliberately extended his authorization for 18 months to avoid its recurrence in an election-charged atmosphere. Some Members of Congress privately advised the administration about the vulnerability of American troops, avoiding public criticism of administration policy. We gave the President's policy every chance to work. For him now to blame Congress for the fact that it did not work defies credulity. It violates the spirit of cooperation and needlessly rips the fabric of congressional sufferance.

As one who has supported the Caribbean Basin Initiative, who has voted for the International Monetary Fund authorizations in the interest of a bipartisan and effective foreign policy, as one who believes that we have a responsibility to help the free institutions in El Salvador to preserve a democratic society for that country, I call upon the President to desist from the harsh partisanship which uses Congress as a scapegoat for policy failures.

It is quite apparent that the President expects Congress to be a silent partner, to put up the money and keep its mouth shut and accept the blame whenever anything goes wrong. That is not the kind of partnership that can endure. That is not the role assigned to the legislative branch by previous Presidents, nor by the Constitution.

Trying to silence dissent, berating those who disagree with a given policy, expecting Congress to bow its head submissively, attempting to intimidate any opposition by insinuations that it is giving comfort to the enemy, accusing the Speaker of the House of being an apostle of surrender for recommending the very policy which the President himself was preparing at that very moment to undertake—these are not the tactics of a President who has mastered the arts of bipartisan leadership, not of one who is devoted sincerely to the goals of a bipartisan foreign policy.

Bipartisanship is a two-way street. It is not a faucet that the President can turn on and off at will. It implies compromise, consultation, and shared responsibility.

Today my word to President Reagan is the same as that of the late Senator Arthur Vandenburg to the late President Harry Truman, when Senator Vandenburg said to President Truman: "If you expect to have us with you on the landing, you must take us with you on the take-off."

I hope that the President will ponder these thoughts, and that the spirit of true bipartisanship may be restored before irreparable damage is done to American foreign policy and to our relations in the world.

IN MEMORY OF THE LATE PHILLIP BURTON

(Mr. MINETA asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. MINETA. Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak in memory of Phillip Burton, our colleague who died 1 year ago today.

This great man was a friend of mine and an inspiration to us all. A tireless worker, he carried out his duty as a U.S. legislator to its highest ideal. He cared about people and strived to empower the powerless in our Nation. Phil dedicated his life to justice in America.

He excelled in the art of compromise. He was one of the most effective negotiators in the history of this House. Phil knew that the public interest is best served when diverse groups sit down together and work out their differences. His achievements in labor law reform, civil rights, public lands protection, congressional procedures, and other areas were skillfully crafted and will last far into the future.

Today, a year after the sad event of his death, I can think of no better commemoration than for the 98th Congress to recognize Phil's leadership in arbitrating among competing interests. To enact the strong California wilderness legislation this man championed would, indeed, be a fitting memorial. It is with due respect that we name a Federal building or two after Phil, but our former colleague deserves much more; he deserves a living legacy.

Phil deserves to have the scenic wonders of his native State preserved for eternity. We all know he was not a starry-eyed backpacker. Rather, Phil was an urban visionary, a man who recognized the value of public lands and open space, clean air and water, protected wildlife, and expanded recreation resources. He worked to insure that these qualities of life would be accessible to all citizens from all sectors of society.

The House passed his carefully balanced California wilderness package last year, and affirmed his judgment that 2.4 million acres of wilderness was the amount we should preserve. We must urge our colleagues in the Senate to uphold this good judgment and swiftly pass legislation with the same provisions.

The 98th Congress was the last in which Phillip Burton participated. Let it also be this Congress which gives California its long-awaited wilderness bill.

STATE-SPONSORED TERRORISM IS REPREHENSIBLE

(Mr. WEISS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. WEISS. Mr. Speaker, under the guise of safeguarding our national security, Ronald Reagan has made of the United States an outlaw nation in the eyes of much of the world.

Can you imagine what we would be saying if the Soviet Union were to have placed mines off the ports and harbors of El Salvador or Honduras?

Whether Ronald Reagan is capable of accepting it or not, State-sponsored terrorism is reprehensible whether committed by us or by the Russians. Only our veto prevented the Security Council of the United Nations, from condemnation of the United States for placing mines off the ports and harbors of Nicaragua.

Ronald Reagan has once again managed to call into worldwide question his balance and judgment when it comes to matters of peace and war. With Reagan administration plans apparently afoot for direct American military involvement in Central America, neither the American people nor the people of the rest of the world can afford to gamble with 4 more years of a Reagan Presidency.

PERMISSION FOR SUBCOMMITTEE ON ENVIRONMENT, ENERGY, AND NATURAL RESOURCES OF COMMITTEE ON GOVERNMENT OPERATIONS TO SIT ON WEDNESDAY AND THURSDAY OF THIS WEEK DURING THE 5-MINUTE RULE

Mr. SYNAR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Subcommittee on Environment, Energy and Natural Resources of the Committee on Government Operations be permitted to sit on Wednesday, April 11, and Thursday, April 12, should the House be reading for amendment under the 5-minute rule at that time.

The minority has been advised of this request, and I understand that there is no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. LEVITAS). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

There was no objection.

STATE-SPONSORED TERRORISM

(Mr. DELLUMS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. DELLUMS. Mr. Speaker, Members of the House, I join my distinguished colleague from New York in condemning the actions of mining the ports and harbors of Nicaragua. Mr. Speaker, several years ago, I served as one of the members of the Select Committee on Intelligence where we investigated allegations of dangerous, unethical, and immoral activity on the part of the American intelligence community.

Many of our national leaders have come before the public to condemn state-sponsored terrorism. I believe mining ports is an act of terrorism. The extent to which we are involved in financing, training, and otherwise being directly or indirectly involved in mining the ports of Nicaragua means clearly that we are involved in the process of state-sponsored terrorism. That is a major contradiction.

It would seem to me that we ought to debate this matter in the full view of the public; discussing it in the context of American policy toward Central America. To engage in state-sponsored terrorism is dangerous, it is immoral, it is unethical, it is unbecoming of one of the great superpowers of this world, and it would seem to me, Mr. Speaker, that we, in the Congress, ought to take appropriate action to stop it.

WHO STANDS IN THE WAY OF A SCHOOL PRAYER AMENDMENT?

(Mr. WALKER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, at this time, I would hope to offer a unanimous-consent request calling for the consideration of a voluntary school prayer constitutional amendment.

The Chair has ruled that in order to make this request, I must have the clearance of the majority and minority leaderships. This request has been cleared by the minority leadership.

I would now be glad to yield for a spokesman from the majority leadership for the appropriate clearance.

Mr. Speaker, somehow, today I felt that we would not get that clearance; the Democrats are today too busy proposing that we cut and run in another part of the world to be bothered by the real business that could be brought before this House.

IN MEMORY OF PHILLIP BURTON

(Mr. BERMAN asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. BERMAN. Mr. Speaker, some leave this Chamber through death, retirement, or defeat, and become blurry images in our minds and in the history of this institution. Today, we recognize the first anniversary of the passing of a Member whose presence was so vivid and whose achievements were so bountiful that he has carved an indelible niche in our hearts and minds and in the history of this country.

Senior citizens, the poor, minorities, women; all who crave for world peace and cherish the unique resources of our land have benefited from Phillip Burton's work in Congress. As I did 1 year ago, I wish to pay tribute to a man who had a profound effect on my own political values. A teacher by example and by design, our beloved and departed colleague, Phillip Burton.

WHO IS GUILTY IN CENTRAL AMERICA?

(Mr. MICHEL asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. MICHEL. Mr. Speaker, it is baseball season and we should all be reminded of that major rule of the game—keep your eye on the ball.

Nowhere does that piece of advice make more sense than in the current controversy over who is doing what to whom in Nicaragua.

Let us keep our eye on what is the real cause of all this trouble in that region—it is the open and brazen attempt of Communists to destroy the economy of El Salvador and eventually take it over.

This effort is being aided by the Sandanista government and the Cuban Government.

Keep your eye on the ball. The Sandanistas are the ones who have been throwing beanballs. Let us not blame their targets. And let us not send our friends to the plate without a helmet.

ANNOUNCEMENT BY THE SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. RATCHFORD). Pursuant to the provisions of clause 5, rule I, the Chair announces that he will postpone further proceedings today on the motion to suspend the rules on which a recorded vote or the yeas and nays are ordered, or on which the vote is objected to under clause 4 of rule XV.

Such rollcall vote, if postponed, will be taken after all other legislative business today.

□ 1250

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may require.

Mr. Speaker, H.R. 1314 would extend through December 31, 1984, the authority which was delegated by the Congress to the President in the Reorganization Act of 1977 to make limited organizational changes in executive branch agencies. The 1977 act provides a process which allows expedited consideration by the Congress of reorganization plans submitted to it. The bill also clarifies further the extent of authority which is delegated to the President.

Mr. Speaker, on 17 occasions since 1932, the Congress has acted to delegate to the President the authority to reorganize legislatively established functions and agencies of the Federal Government. Reorganization authority provides an expedited means of consideration of reorganization plans by the Congress. During the periods when reorganization authority is not in effect. The President is required to follow the traditional legislative process in order to make even minor changes in entities or functions which were established legislatively.

As has been the case on a number of occasions in the past, H.R. 1314 places additional restrictions on the authority which it delegates to the President. The bill prohibits the President from renaming an executive department through a reorganization plan or creating a new agency outside of an already existing department or agency. The bill also extends the timeframes under which reorganization plans are considered by the Congress.

Mr. Speaker, the principal change to reorganization authority which is provided by H.R. 1314 is the manner in which reorganization plans would become effective. Under the 1977 act, a reorganization plan would become effective unless either House of Congress passed a resolution disapproving the plan. H.R. 1314 instead requires that a plan would take effect only if both Houses pass a joint resolution approving the plan.

For many years, a number of members of the committee, including myself, were concerned about the constitutional propriety of the legislative veto provision contained in reorganization authority. H.R. 1314 anticipated the Supreme Court's decision in Chadha against INS, which declared the legislative veto unconstitutional, by requiring that reorganization plans must be voted upon positively by both Houses and signed by the President in order to become effective.

Mr. Speaker, the bill which is before us today is the product of study by both the Committee on Government Operations and the very distinguished Committee on Rules and it is in the form of an amendment from the Committee on Rules which incorporates both committees' amendments. This bill will extend to the President the authority to make limited organizational changes in executive branch agencies in an expedited fashion, and it will do so in a manner which is constitutionally permissible.

Mr. Speaker, I urge a positive vote on H.R. 1314.

Mr. HORTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 5 minutes.

Mr. Spearker, for more than 50 years, the Reorganization Act has guaranteed the President expedited congressional action on his plans for transferring the responsibility for performing governmental functions from one agency to another. The act has thus insured that proposals for important organizational changes receive our attention—and they have usually received our acceptance, as well. The act has been a powerful tool in making the executive branch of Government more efficient and more responsive to the President.

The bill before us today would renew that authority, which has lain dormant for 3 years, and reshape it to make the President's power more constrained by the Congress than it was in previous versions of the law. In the past, a reorganization plan became effective unless either House of Congress passed, within a fixed time period, a resolution disapproving the plan. Under H.R. 1314, a plan could become effective only if both Houses passed, again within a fixed time, a resolution approving it, and the resolution was signed by the President.

I am sure that many here are well aware of the controversy surrounding the legislative veto, and consequently understand why this change is necessary. The Supreme Court ruled last June, in a case called Immigration and Naturalization Service against Chadha, that such a veto violates the Constitution's command that all legislation be passed by both Houses of Congress and signed by the President in order to become law. H.R. 1314 replaces the procedure in previous reorganization acts with one which clearly meets the Supreme Court's tests of constitutionality.

H.R. 1314 also makes several lesser changes in the Reorganization Act. It precludes plans from creating new agencies which are not components of existing agencies, or from renaming an existing department; extends the time for consideration of a plan from 60 to 90 days; and requires the President to submit with each plan a description of how the plan will be implemented.

The administration is in full support of this bill. In fact, the principal change between this measure and previous versions of the act was specifically recommended by the administration.

This bill also enjoys broad support among Government Operations Committee Republicans and Democrats. I urge its adoption.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from Georgia (Mr. LEVITAS).

Mr. LEVITAS. Mr. Speaker, I would like to express my appreciation to the distinguished gentleman from Texas, the chairman of my committee, for yielding this time to me, and also my commendation to him and the ranking member, the gentleman from New York, for bringing up this extremely important piece of legislation.

Reorganization of the executive branch of Government has been an important and necessary function of the Presidency since the days of President Hoover, and it has been exercised by Presidents throughout this period of time. It is important that we maintain this authority in order to give the President the opportunity to structure an administration in a more streamlined form to carry out the policies for which he was elected.

When the Supreme Court decided the Chadha case and displayed their abysmal ignorance of how this Government works, and they created a tremendous uncertainty in Government by eliminating a procedure that helped make Government work. The Chadha decision said that, what was then known as the legislative veto provision, giving each House or both Houses the opportunity to disapprove executive or agency actions, in this case a reorganization plan, was unconstitutional. The consequence of that decision was to eliminate the quid pro quo of reorganization; namely, that where the President was given reorganization authority to make these changes by submitting a plan to Congress, they would go into effect unless they were disapproved by either House of the Congress.

This procedure worked well for some 50 years, until Chadha. The Attorney General in each administration came before Congress and testified that this was an appropriate and constitutional way to operate. Yet, because of the decision in the Chadha case, the legislative veto was held to be invalid, and tremendous uncertainty was created. This is just one example of the train wreck of Government that was brought about by that decision.

Earlier this year I introduced a bill (H.R. 5087) which would have sunsetted this reorganization provision in law altogether in order to make the point that it was absolutely necessary that we adopt a new mechanism. Unless we adopted a new approach, either there would be no reorganization authority or it would exist without any congressional involvement. Unless we adopted a new approach, we would be faced with this problem again in future litigation. The legislation we have today, H.R. 1314, will solve that problem.

Let me point out just how bad this situation is. In a Mississippi Federal district court, the judge ruled that the reorganization authority was unconstitutional because of the Chadha decision. The court also held that Congress would have never delegated this power to the President without having a legislative veto to make certain that the reorganization was compatible with the wishes of the Congress. This review was necessary because the President held the power to repeal acts, to transfer authority from one agency to another, and to transfer personnel. The court said that the veto was absolutely unseverable in this case and, therefore, when the reorganization authority fell, the court, in that instance, held that the agency which had been reorganized (it was the Equal Employment Opportunities Commission), was likewise invalid and unconstitutional. In other words, the court said Congress would never have given the President reorganization authority without linking it to a legislative veto.

However, there followed a case in Tennessee Federal court where the same issue was presented. In that case the court held that, yes, Congress could delegate this authority to the President and that it was unconstitutional to have legislative veto. However, the court decided that the veto could be severed. So the President had all the authority—unchecked—and Congress had no opportunity to review the Presidential action.

This legislation we are considering today remedies that problem and creates the "son of legislative veto." It has created the "son of legislative veto" because, while the President may propose the reorganization plan, it will not become effective unless approved by both Houses and signed by the President in the form of a joint resolution. But, obviously, if it takes both Houses to pass it, then if one House does not take action or rejects the plan, then it acts as a one House legislative veto of that plan. So the genius is that we can still have a one-house veto mechanism.

I would like to commend the distinguished chairman of the committee for his timeliness, his ingenuity, and his upholding of the principle that the Congress of this Nation, under section 1, article I, of the Constitution, is where the laws are to be made. This "son of legislative veto" which we will pass today should be a blueprint for us to follow in frequent future occasions as we try to get the train of Government back on track from the train wreck which the Chadha case brought to us.

Mr. HORTON. Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time, and I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time, and I yield back the balance of my time.

□ 1300

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from Texas (Mr. BROOKS) that the House suspend the rules and pass the bill, H.R. 1314, as amended.

The question was taken; and (two-thirds having voted in favor thereof) the rules were suspended and the bill, as amended, was passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to extend their remarks on the bill just passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

PROVIDING FOR CONSIDERATION OF H.R. 4900, PANAMA CANAL APPROPRIATIONS AUTHORIZATION ACT, FISCAL YEAR 1985

Mr. BONIOR of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Rules, I call up House Resolution 471 and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

H. RES. 471

Resolved, That at any time after the adoption of this resolution the Speaker may, pursuant to clause 1(b) of rule XXIII, declare the House resolved into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H.R. 4900) to authorize appropriations for fiscal year 1985 for the operation and maintenance of the Panama Canal, and for other purposes, and the first reading of the bill shall be dispensed with. After general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and shall continue not to exceed one hour, to be equally divided and controlled by the Chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, the bill shall be considered for amendment under the five-minute rule, and each section shall be considered as having been read. It shall be in order to consider the amendment recommended by the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries inserting a new section 6 now printed in the bill, and all points of order against said amendment for failure to comply with the provisions of clause 7, rule XVI are hereby waived, At the conclusion of the consideration of the bill for amendment, the Committee shall rise and report the bill for amendment, the Committee shall rise and report the bill to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Michigan (Mr. BONIOR) is recognized for 1 hour.

Mr. BONIOR of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, for purposes of debate only I yield the customary 30 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri (Mr. TAYLOR), pending which I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, House Resolution 471 provides for the consideration of H.R. 4900, the Panama Canal Appropriations Authorization Act For Fiscal Year 1985. The resolution provides 1 hour of general debate to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

House Resolution 471 provides an open rule, making in order germane amendments. The resolution makes in order a committee amendment adding a new section 6 now printed in the bill and waives all points of order against the amendment for failure to comply with clause 7, rule XVI, the germaneness rule. The committee amendment violates the germaneness rule because, at the time the amendment would be offered, H.R. 4900 is a simple 1-year authorization and the amendment proposes a permanent change in law, therefore violating the germaneness rule. The resolution also provides for one motion to recommit.

Mr. Speaker, H.R. 4900 authorizes appropriations of $443,946,000 from the Panama Canal Commission Fund, which is comprised of canal revenues, for the operation and maintenance of the Panama Canal and the activities of the Panama Canal Commission. The Panama Canal Act of 1979 intended to insure that the canal be run at no expense to the U.S. taxpayer. The amount authorized in this bill is therefore equal to the amount estimated will be collected by tolls levied on ships using the canal. Accordingly, this legislation has no inflationary impact and contains no new budget authority.

Mr. Speaker, the Panama Canal Commission has demonstrated its ability to operate the canal skillfully and efficiently. It has provided stability in a situation where stability is often elusive. Passage of H.R. 4900 will allow the Commission to continue its fine work.

House Resolution 471 provides open discussion of the legislation and makes in order an important committee amendment. It is a very good rule under which to consider this authorization bill and I urge its adoption.

I might also add, Mr. Speaker, that I had the honor and privilege to work on this legislation when it was first proposed in the Congress back in, I believe, 1977 and 1978, and I had made numerous trips to Panama to talk with the various interests, labor, management, and government who had the responsibility of seeing that the canal was run expeditiously and fairly to all those who engaged in international commerce.

I would like to take this opportunity to commend not only those members on the Commission and in our Government but also our President, who has seen fit over the last few years to understand the necessity for the transfer of the canal and who now embraces it as if it were one of his children.

I commend the President for his foresight on this particular issue. I would also like to praise at this time my dear colleagues on the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries with whom I have worked over the years, and particularly I commend the leadership of the gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. HUBBARD) who has watched this issue, as we all know, very closely and who has been a leader in international relations as it relates to commerce and the canal and who, I think, has offered very fine service to this country with respect to this issue.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. TAYLOR. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may require.

Mr. Speaker, in the Rules Committee both the Republican and Democratic representatives of the Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee requested an open rule, providing 1 hour of general debate. The Rules Committee gave them what they wanted.

Because the specific provisions of the rule have already been ably described, I will not repeat them.

Mr. Speaker, there are a few points of controversy in this bill.

For example, in the Rules Committee, the gentleman from New York (Mr. CARNEY) pointed out that he believes the funding level in this authorization bill is too high.

Also, at the time of the Rules Committee meeting the Office of Management and Budget provided a statement of administration policy noting that while the administration prefers that this bill be amended to provide for appropriations for the Panama Canal Commission from the general fund of the U.S. Treasury rather than the Panama Canal Commission Fund, the administration still supports House passage of the bill.

Mr. Speaker, this open rule will allow Members to offer any necessary amendments. I support the rule so that the House may proceed to consider the Panama Canal authorization bill.

□ 1310

Mr. Speaker, I have no requests for time, and I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. BONIOR of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, it is just a delight to see the House in unison on this very important issue. I can remember 4 or 5 years ago when the streets were packed, the Chambers were full, and the voices were loud and angry and acrimonious.

It is just wonderful to see us work in a bipartisan tradition in this body on a very important issue to a very beleaguered part of the world, Central America.

Mr. Speaker, I have no requests for time, and I move the previous question on the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

PROVIDING FOR CONSIDERATION OF H.R. 7, CHILD NUTRITION ACT OF 1963 EXTENSION

Mr. BONIOR of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Rules, I call up House Resolution 478 and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

H. RES. 478

Resolved, That at any time after the adoption of this resolution the Speaker may, pursuant to clause 1(b) of rule XXIII, declare the House resolved into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H.R. 7) to make permanent certain of the authorizations of appropriations under the National School Lunch Act and the Child Nutrition Act of 1963, and the first reading of the bill shall be dispensed with. All points of order against the consideration of the bill for failure to comply with the provisions of section 303(a)(4) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974 (Public Law 93-344) are hereby waived. After general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and shall continue not to exceed one hour, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Education and Labor, the bill shall be considered for amendment under the five-minute rule. It shall be in order to consider the amendment in the nature of a substitute recommended by the Committee on Education and Labor now printed in the bill as an original bill for the purpose of amendment under the five-minute rule, each section of said substitute shall be considered as having been read, and all points of order against said substitute for failure to comply with the provisions of sections 303(a)(4) and 401(b)(1) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974 are hereby waived. At the conclusion of the consideration of the bill for amendment, the Committee shall rise and report the bill to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and any Member may demand a separate vote in the House on any amendment adopted in the Committee of the Whole to the bill or to the committee amendment in the nature of a substitute. The previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit with or without instructions.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Michigan (Mr. BONIOR) is recognized for 1 hour.

Mr. BONIOR of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, for the purpose of debate only, I yield the customary 30 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. LATTA), pending which I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, House Resolution 478 provides for the consideration of H.R. 7 extending and improving the National School Lunch and Child Nutrition Act of 1963. The resolution provides 1 hour of general debate to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Education and Labor. This is an open rule allowing any germane amendments to be offered.

The resolution also makes in order the consideration of a committee amendment in the nature of a substitute printed in the bill as original text for the purposes of amendment.

House Resolution 478 waives section 303(a)(4) of the Budget Act against consideration of the bill as introduced. This section of the Budget Act prohibits its consideration of legislation that would provide new entitlement authority which was first effective for a fiscal year prior to the adoption of the first budget resolution for that fiscal year. Sections 2 and 3 of H.R. 7 as introduced create new entitlement authority first effective in fiscal year 1985 by reauthorizing certain child nutrition and school lunch programs which would otherwise expire at the end of the current fiscal year. Because House Concurrent Resolution 280, the fiscal year 1985 budget resolution, has not yet been passed by both Houses, H.R. 7 as introduced could not be considered at this time without being subject to a point of order. However, reauthorization of the child nutrition programs included in sections 2 and 3 of the bill were assumed in House Concurrent Resolution 280, the first budget resolution as it recently passed the House. In light of this, the Committee on Rules waived section 303(a)(4) of the Budget Act against consideration of H.R. 7 as introduced.

House Resolution 478 also waives section 303(a)(4) of the Budget Act against consideration of the committee substitute. Sections 2 and 3 of the committee substitute require and received a 303(a)(4) Budget Act waiver for the same reasons the bill as introduced required and received the waiver. In addition, House Resolution 478, waives section 401(b)(1) of the Budget Act against consideration of the substitute. The committee substitute modifies the existing authorization for the women, infant's, and children's supplemental fund program (WIC) by converting it to a capped entitlement program first effective in fiscal year 1985. This is a violation of section 401(b)(1) of the Budget Act which prohibits consideration of measures providing new spending or entitlement authority becoming effective prior to the fiscal year beginning during the calendar year in which the bill was reported. Because the entitlement status of the WIC program becomes effective in fiscal year 1985, the substitute is in violation of the Budget Act.

However, Chairman PERKINS of the Committee on Education and Labor indicated in his testimony before the Committee on Rules that an amendment would be offered during floor consideration of H.R. 7 to strike the entitlement provisions for the WIC program, thus retaining the program as an authorization subject to annual appropriations. In light of Chairman PERKIN's assurance of a floor vote on the matter, the Committee on Rules granted a waiver of section 401(b)(1) of the Budget Act.

In addition, sections, 4, 5, 6, 8, and 9 of the committee substitute will create new entitlement authority by liberalizing certain provisions in the child nutrition and school lunch program which would be effective upon enactment. Because H.R. 7 was reported in calendar year 1984 and the new entitlement authority would become effective in 1984, those sections of the substitute also violate section 401(b)(1) of the Budget Act. However, those sections were included in H.R. 4091 which passed the House on October 25, 1983, in compliance with the Budget Act. For this reason, the Committee on Rules granted a waiver of section 401(b)(1) of the Budget Act.

Finally, House Resolution 478 also provides one motion to recommit with or without instructions.

Mr. Speaker, H.R. 7, the School Lunch and Child Nutrition Amendments of 1984, extends for 4 years, five child nutrition programs which expire on September 30, 1984, the end of this fiscal year. These programs include the summer food service program for children, the commodity distribution program, the nutrition education and training program, the funding for State administrative expenses and the special supplemental food program for women, infants, and children (WIC). H.R. 7 also restores some of the funding cuts made in the school lunch and child nutrition program in recent years and restores certain provisions of law eliminated in 1981.

Mr. Speaker, we cannot afford to let our children go hungry. We cannot jeopardize their development by denying them enough to eat. There are so many things we wish we could do for the children in this country, and while so many of these things we cannot do for them—we can feed them.

Mr. Speaker, this legislation enjoys bipartisan support as does this rule for its consideration. House Resolution 478 provides for open, fair, and timely debate on legislation of the utmost importance to our well being as a nation and I urge its adoption.

□ 1320

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. LATTA. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, I object to some of the provisions in this rule. I object to some of the provisions in the bill.

First with regard to the rule, the problem is that it waives two separate provisions of the Budget Act.

The first Budget Act provision waived is section 303(a)(4). This section of the Budget Act prohibits the consideration of any measure providing new entitlement authority first effective for a fiscal year prior to the adoption of the first budget resolution for the fiscal year.

Mr. Speaker, this House adopted a budget resolution last week, but we certainly have not settled on the final version of the budget resolution which will only be put together after negotiation between this House and the other body. It is possible that the final version of the budget resolution may be a good deal different from the House-passed version. Yet, under this rule, we will be considering new entitlement authority prior to the adoption of the final version of the budget resolution.

Mr. Speaker, there is nothing in this bill that is such an emergency that it could not wait until the first budget resolution for fiscal year 1985 is finally in place.

The next problem with this rule, Mr. Speaker, is the specific provisions covered by this Budget Act waiver. One of the provisions protected by this waiver is section 20 of the bill which would modify the existing authorization for the WIC program to convert it into a capped entitlement program first effective in fiscal year 1985. Mr. Speaker, what we should be doing is controlling entitlements, not creating new ones. Let me emphasize that. What we should be doing is controlling entitlements and not creating new ones. If there is any hope of ever getting our massive deficits under control, we cannot tolerate provisions like this one which converts the WIC program into an entitlement.

I hope the House will pay special attention to this particular action that is being proposed. Every time you go back home and talk about entitlement programs not being under the control of the Congress, do not forget to tell the people in the next breath that we, the Congress, make them entitlement programs. So now here they are attempting to make this WIC program an entitlement program so that they will have absolutely no control over it.

If we are going to get the deficits down, we have to do something about entitlements and not create new ones.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LATTA. I will be happy to yield to the chairman that brought this monstrosity out of his committee.

Mr. PERKINS. First let me state that I would hope if the gentleman reads this bill again that he will find that it is not a monstrosity but a bill that every Member in the Chamber, I think, can vote for.

One thing I want to make very clear about the WIC program being converted into an entitlement. I made a statement yesterday, I made a statement yesterday before the Committee on Rules, that it would be changed back today on the floor by an appropriation, and the gentleman from California, Mr. MILLER, will offer that amendment. It will not be an entitlement program. The WIC program will not be an entitlement program.

Mr. LATTA. Then we have had a change of heart on this matter since it came out of your committee. Now then, you are going to support the amendment to put it back like it was supposed to be.

Mr. PERKINS. That is correct.

Mr. LATTA. I thank the gentleman for that concession, and I am certain that the taxpayers will thank him also.

Mr. Speaker, there is also a second Budget Act waiver in this bill. That is a waiver of section 401(b)(1) which prohibits the consideration of any bill providing new entitlement authority, which is effective prior to October 1 of the calendar year in which the bill is reported.

Sections 4, 5, 6, 8, and 9 of the bill would create new entitlement authority by liberalizing certain provisions in the child nutrition and school lunch program effective upon enactment. Since the bill was reported in calendar year 1984, and since the new entitlement authority would be effective immediately, the bill would violate section 401(b)(1) of the Budget Act.

Mr. Speaker, I do not think it is good policy to be liberalizing entitlements at a time when excessive deficits are the issue we are all supposed to be concerned about. And I certainly do not think it is worth waiving the Budget Act to liberalize entitlements.

These are my objections to this rule, Mr. Speaker. Now let me mention briefly the problems with the bill.

First, according to the information provided by the Office of Management and Budget at the time the Rules Committee met, if H.R. 7 were to reach the President's desk, disapproval would be recommended. Mr. Speaker, we may be wasting a lot of time on a bill which could be vetoed in its present form.

The administration is strongly opposed to this bill because it would reverse recently enacted program reforms that target assistance on the neediest schoolchildren and that improve program accountability. In addition, this bill would add about $570 million to the President's fiscal year 1985 budget at a time when Congress and the administration are working to reduce the deficit. It would add $4.6 billion over the next 5 years.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, let me just mention one specific provision in this bill which illustrates the problems with the bill. This is a provision which moves away from carefully targeting Federal subsidies to the neediest. It is the provision that restores the tiering reimbursement-claiming option to the child care food program.

According to information provided in the Rules Committee, a day care center may have one-third of its children coming from families eligible for free meals, one-third of the children may be eligible for reduced price meals, and the remaining one-third entitled to paid meal benefits. Under the terms of the tiering approach, the day care center can claim the highest rate of meal reimbursement for all meals served.

Mr. PERKINS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LATTA. I will be happy to yield.

Mr. PERKINS. Let me say to my distinguished colleague from Ohio (Mr. LATTA) that that provision has likewise been changed or has been agreed to by both your side of the aisle and our side of the aisle and a satisfactory amendment will be worked out, and it is not as you speak.

Mr. LATTA. I am delighted, Mr. Chairman, for all of these concessions. And I have just been informed that you have been working hard on them.

Maybe I ought to go on and go clear through this bill and maybe I will get enough concessions that the President could sign it.

Mr. Speaker, this is another example of unnecessary waste of taxpayers' money unless it is cleaned up in a good many areas. I will not impose on the time of the House by pointing them all out, but certainly during debate on this legislation, some of these matters will be brought out. I have a whole list of them here that we could change. Hopefully, before consideration of this bill is over, we can have a piece of legislation that we can support.

□ 1330

Mr. PERKINS. If the gentleman will yield, in my judgment, the way this bill is written, and the amendments that have been agreed to on both sides of the aisle, there is no doubt in my mind but that your President is going to sign this bill. It is one of the best bills we have.

Mr. LATTA. Well, we are going to have to wait, Mr. Chairman, and see how many more of these amendments the gentleman is going to agree to. But he is coming along. I commend him for that.

Mr. PERKINS. Well, let me state that I have discussed with the gentleman about all the amendments that I know anything about being agreed to. But the bill is not an expensive bill.

The breakfast program is a permanent program; it is not included here. The school lunch program is a permanent program; it is not included here. The only thing we modify in the school lunch program is by reducing the reimbursement rate from about 40 cents down to 25 cents for poor children.

I know that provision is not going to turn the President of the United States off.

This is a wonderful bill. I think any President will sign this bill.

Mr. LATTA. Let me ask the gentleman, while he is on his feet, Mr. Chairman, whether or not one of these changes that he might make in his legislation deals with the language which would permit high tuition schools for the well-to-do to receive school lunch subsidies?

Is the gentleman still going to have the taxpayers taking care of this?

Mr. PERKINS. Well, the only thing we permit——

Mr. LATTA. Is the gentleman going to make changes in that?

Mr. PERKINS. We permit commodity distribution and we have bonus commodities but they mostly go to the poorer school districts of the country and not the wealthier school districts.

Mr. LATTA. Let me rephrase my question. Now if the gentleman will listen carefully. I asked him whether or not one of the amendments that he will agree to will have anything to do with the legislation as now written which would permit high tuition schools for the well-to-do to receive school lunch subsidies?

Now is the gentleman going to change that? That has nothing to do with poor kids. It goes to the well-to-do at taxpayers' expense. Is the gentleman going to change that?

Mr. PERKINS. Let me state that the well-to-do children will all pay; they will pay the regular reimbursement rate which any children above the reduced price level will pay. They will all pay the same and it applies equally and uniformly to all children.

Mr. LATTA. Mr. Chairman, I understand four amendments are going to be offered and maybe this will be cleared up in some of the amendments.

Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. GOODLING).

Mr. GOODLING. I asked for this time not to really talk about the rule but to talk about the bill itself, and particularly to respond to the April 9, 1984, communication we have received from OMB Director Stockman because there are a lot of things he says in his letter with which I agree. Many of the issues Mr. Stockman raises are the same issues discussed in subcommittee and we offered amendments during subcommittee markup. We did the same in full committee. Some of these will be offered and accepted today, and we will clear up some objectionable features in the bill.

But let me comment further on certain portions of the Stockman letter. In the third item Mr. Stockman talks about H.R. 7 reversing 12 reforms contained in the 1981 Gramm-Latta reconciliation bill. I think "reversing" probably is not the word. I think there is some fine tuning that is necessary, keeping in mind that the changes incorporated in the 1981 Omnibus Budget Reconciliation Act, were developed, very rapidly, and were talking about 1981 and now we are talking about 1985.

Touching briefly upon some of those items the OMB director has highlighted. Increasing reimbursement rates for meals for "better off" students. I think "better off" is a bad term to use. Because if you happen to be a family of four at $12,800, you may think you are working poor and you probably should quit because you probably would do better by not working at all.

So I think we ought to be careful when we use the word "better off," when we can be talking about some people whose income as a family of four is at $12,800.

The only thing done at the other end was to raise the reduced-price income eligibility limit by $900, and that after a 4-year period (1981–85).

Hiking the income eligibility limit for reduced-price meals. Again it is important to keep in mind that the reduced-price income eligibility in H.R. 7 is established at the same percent of the poverty guideline as was in place prior to the 1981 Reconciliation Act. Again, you are raising the income level $900 when you do that.

The next item mentioned is the addition of 6 cents to the reimbursement to institutions for all breakfasts served to all children. This change was made on the basis of a USDA evaluation on the school nutrition programs. Witnesses from the Department testified before our committee stating that the nutritional adequacy of the breakfast offered was seriously lacking. The school breakfast is apparently only better than no breakfast at all. Breakfast rates were increased so that the breakfasts could be improved. Another item suggests we are now in H.R. 7.

Permitting high tuition schools for the well-to-do to receive school lunch subsidies. It shall be remembered that all private and public schools could participate in the national school lunch program, regardless of the tuition charged, prior to the 1981 Reconciliation Act. With that legislation, only private schools with annual tuitions of $1,500 or below could continue to participate in the federally assisted child nutrition programs.

On the next three items, I would agree wholeheartedly with the OMB Director. We should not be in the school food equipment assistance business at this particular time.

If we had adequate revenues, we could again consider the need for Federal equipment assistance. We did amend the proposal in committee so that it would be targeted to the very neediest schools. However, a USDA survey does indicate that there appears to be no general need for further Federal assistance in the school equipment area.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOODLING. I would be happy to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, let me state for the benefit of our colleague from Ohio (Mr. LATTA) that we raised, in order to qualify private schools, we raise from $1,500 to $2,500 and if that provision is not changed at $2,500, then two-thirds of the Catholic high schools will be eliminated from the lunch program. Many of these schools have been poor, have many poor students and the President is certainly in favor of private education.

So I know he would not want to push two-thirds of Catholic high schools out of the lunch program if we had not raised that figure to $2,500.

That is all that is.

Mr. GOODLING. I agree with the OMB Director on the next item also, when he talks about the summer feeding program. I would not characterize all of our private nonprofit sponsors as fraud prone. Among some there has been serious mismanagement and abuse of the summer feeding program. I was one who supported greater involvement of the schools and local, municipal, and county governments in the running of summer feeding programs.

We have written an amendment in such a manner that I believe we are going to prevent fraud and abuse from coming back in if private sponsors again become eligible and that amendment will be offered later today that I think will take care of that.

I have argued against allowing all private nonprofit sponsors back into the program—especially when a few were there to make a buck rather than to provide nutrition to youngsters.

I would agree with him on the tiering phase of the child care food program. We will have an amendment here also, but I am not for tiering in the child care food program because it does not target nutrition assistance on the basis of the family's economic need.

If we want additional Federal funds for day care services generally, that should be addressed in another piece of legislation.

We will have an amendment that will help clarify that point.

Then the next was increasing to five the maximum number of meals and snacks. This would go back to the original proposal before it was changed in 1981.

As was indicated, we oppose the entitlement part of WIC, and an amendment will be put forward to eliminate WIC entitlement features. Some of us also believe, perhaps, even though there is need for WIC services, that we should maintain the program at the October 1, 1983 level.

□ 1340

So as I indicated, there are numerous things that the OMB Director indicates are wrong. We agree with some of them. We discussed these areas in subcommittee and full committee. We have made a lot of improvements since this letter was written. I hope that we will make more progress today so that it can become a bipartisan effort.

Mr. LATTA. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOODLING. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. LATTA. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

As a matter of enlightenment, this legislation does not do anything for the really poor kids. We have this program for the poor kids where we give them free lunches, not subsidized lunches, we give them free lunches.

Now is there anything in there that is going to help those kids, the really needy kids?

Mr. GOODLING. I would say indirectly in that we lost an awful lot of schools from the school lunch program. There are many people, including many in the Congress, who never realized that their own children were receiving reimbursement for school lunches. That was done because, first of all, the school lunch program was a way to give away the farm surplus. But, in addition, there has always been cash support for those who are above the poverty level. Continued support for paying children was about 30 cents per lunch, but, in the 1981 Reconciliation Act it was lowered to about 21 cents per lunch. Many schools dropped out simply because they could not make the school lunch program go because they had to raise prices and they lost many of their paying customers.

We discovered that it is cheaper to try to subsidize somewhat that paying customer if, as a matter of fact, you are serious when you say you are going to take care of the free and reduced price eligible children.

Otherwise, you have to set up a separate program and single out the poorer children wherever they may be, which is much more expensive. But they would not participate in such a separate program just for the neediest.

But indirectly, the answer is yes. I suppose directly for free school lunches you could argue "no." However, if the poorest youngsters are not getting a nutritionally decent breakfast, according to the USDA study, then the additional 6 cents, hopefully, will help to provide a good school breakfast to the children eligible for free meals whom the gentleman is talking about.

Mr. LATTA. Let me get back to my question another way. Are we providing more money for the poor kids in this legislation? I am talking about the ones who get free lunches, not subsidized lunches, but free lunches.

Mr. GOODLING. I would say "yes" in the school breakfast program. But, as far as more money for free school lunches is concerned, "no" directly. Indirectly, "yes" in that you are going to restore some school lunch programs that have been dropped and therefore provide meals to those free and reduced price children who are not able to participate.

Mr. LATTA. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. WALKER).

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, this is the kind of rule that makes a sham out of the budget process.

Last week, when we were here on the floor talking about the budget, we heard an awful lot about the integrity of that process. How we needed to pass budgets that could be enforced. How much integrity that process needed to have. How we needed to make certain that what we did could be supported by the legislation that came before us a little bit later on.

Mr. LATTA. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALKER. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. LATTA. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Just let me say that was last week. Last week we worried about the deficit. This week we hand out all these goodies.

Mr. WALKER. The gentleman is absolutely right.

So a week later we come to the floor with a rule calling for budget waivers. Now, I am going to be interested to see how many Members who voted for the budget process last week will this week turn around and vote for this rule which waives the whole process. And say the process is meaningless, let us forget it, let us not worry about the budget any longer and so on. That was last week. Let us simply waive the budget with regard to this program, because, after all, we know that this program is something that we ought to waive the budget for.

Well, I would submit that I think that my colleagues ought to question that premise because there are some questions about whether or not this is the kind of bill that we ought to be waiving the budget for. Some of the reforms that we put in place a couple of years ago seem to be working pretty well.

For instance, a number of students eating full price lunches, in other words, the better-off students in our schools has dropped. That is where the decline in a number of school lunches has come, that number of students has declined from 15.3 million down to 11.2 million. But the students getting free lunches, the ones who really need it, that has increased. Between 1979 and 1983, that has gone up by almost 300,000 students. For the first time in history, in 1982, as a result of the reforms that were put in place, for the first time in the history of the program more free and reduced price lunches were served to the truly needy students than were served to upper-income students. For the first time in history we were able to target the money toward low- and middle-income students. That is what we should be doing.

In addition, the percentage of the Federal program expenditures for free lunches increased during every year during the 5-year study. The study I am referring to—these are not my figures, this came out of a GAO report—GAO took a look at this program. The GAO said during the 5-year period, 1979 to 1983, the share of money going to low-income students went from 62.6 percent of the program in 1979 to 77.4 percent of the program in 1983. In other words, low-income poor children are getting a greater share of the program by a fairly large percentage, by about 15 percent more. That is what we should be doing.

And yet, what we come to the floor doing today is we come out here with a budget waiver so that we are able to give more money to upper income students. That is not what this budget process has to be all about. Obviously, we would like to give money to everybody, but the question is whether we can afford it. And we cannot afford this program.

I would suggest a "no" vote on this rule.

Mr. LATTA. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Arizona (Mr. RUDD).

Mr. RUDD. Mr. Speaker, I rise in opposition to H.R. 7, the School Lunch and Child Nutrition Amendments of 1984 as reported.

This legislation would reverse many recently enacted and long-needed program reforms which have helped to target nutritional assistance to the neediest schoolchildren and improve program accountability.

For example, the bill would prohibit verification of income eligibility for subsidized meals, unless all costs associated with verification and borne by the States are fully reimbursed by the Federal Government.

The "tiering reimbursement option" under the child care food program would allow all children, regardless of need, to qualify for free meals if two-thirds or more of the children in a child care center are otherwise eligible. You see, Mr. Speaker, no attempt is made to target assistance only to the needy. This country simply cannot afford to continue subsidizing those who are able to provide for themselves and their families.

The bill would also prohibit the Secretary of Agriculture from making changes in the methods of determining eligibility for free or reduced-price meals under the school lunch and child nutrition programs. While this prohibition is intended to prevent changes in eligibility without the approval of Congress, it merely insures that Congress has a chance to ignore the issue and postpone any necessary changes.

Finally, the bill would convert the women, infants, and children (WIC) program to entitlement status in fiscal year 1985. I strongly oppose creating yet another entitlement program at a time when Congress is struggling to hold the Federal deficit below $200 billion annually.

While I support adequate nutritional assistance to those in need, this legislation goes far beyond that objective and allows others, who can indeed provide for themselves, to participate in feeding programs at taxpayers' expense. For these reasons, I must oppose H.R. 7. I urge my colleagues to vote against it as well.

Mr. BONIOR of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, this is an open rule and as Members know, under an open rule amendments are in order to take care of the deficiencies that Members feel may exist in the bill.

So the criticism that my colleague from Arizona (Mr. RUDD) has suggested is really not valid. If the gentleman disagrees with sections of the bill that are not waived, he certainly can pose amendments to correct any perceived deficiencies.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BONIOR of Michigan. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. PERKINS. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I would like to make one thing perfectly clear before we vote on this rule.

Everything that is in this bill is in the budget resolution except the WIC entitlement and that will be removed. And when we remove that, the appropriate change to a program subject to an annual appropriation, that falls within the budget resolution.

So I do not want anyone to believe that we are busting the budget anywhere along the line here.

□ 1350

Mr. BONIOR of Michigan. I thank the chairman for that contribution. I think he put the resolution and the bill in its proper perspective.

Mr. RUDD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BONIOR of Michigan. I yield to my colleague, the gentleman from Arizona, for purposes of debate only.

Mr. RUDD. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I have great respect for the chairman of the committee and the dean of the delegation from Kentucky. But I am not addressing myself about whether it is busting the budget or not. I am addressing myself to the fact that it is turning back time and is again including programs that have been previously removed. I think it goes far beyond what is ever intended by this Congress—at least my understanding of it—as to whether or not everybody should be funded by the taxpayer or whether only those who are truly needy should be funded.

Mr. BONIOR of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. DURBIN). The question is on the resolution.

The question was taken; and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that a quorum is not present and make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Evidently a quorum is not present.

The Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—yeas 275, nays 125, not voting 33, as follows:

PANAMA CANAL APPROPRIATIONS AUTHORIZATION ACT, FISCAL YEAR 1985

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to House Resolution 471 and rule XXIII, the Chair declares the House in the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill, H.R. 4900.

IN THE COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H.R. 4900) to authorize appropriations for fiscal year 1985 for the operation and maintenance of the Panama Canal, and for other purposes, with Mr. KILDEE in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Pursuant to the rule, the first reading of the bill is dispensed with.

Under the rule, the gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. HUBBARD) will be recognized for 30 minutes and the gentleman from New York (Mr. CARNEY) will be recognized for 30 minutes.

The Chair recognized the gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. HUBBARD).

Mr. HUBBARD. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Chairman and my colleagues, I rise in support of House bill 4900, a bill which I introduced along with many of my colleagues from the Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee. This bill authorizes appropriations for fiscal year 1985 for the operation and maintenance of the Panama Canal. Such authorizing legislation is required by the provisions of the Panama Canal Act of 1979, Public Law 96-70, establishing the Panama Canal Commission as an agency in the executive branch of the U.S. Government for the operation of the Panama Canal under the President of the United States and the Secretary of Defense.

House bill 4900, as reported by the Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee, sets an overall funding level of $443,946,000 of which $27,900,000 is for capital improvements which shall remain available until expended. This bill does include specific limitations on certain designated expenses of the Commission, but does not deter the Commission from operating efficiently and effectively.

The Panama Canal Commission is a completely unique agency in that it has its own specific funding. The intent of the Panama Canal Act of 1979 was to assure that the canal operate at no cost to the U.S. taxpayers. The Panama Canal Commission is obligated by law to operate within a balanced budget and can only be appropriated the amount that it estimates will be collected as revenue by tolls levied on ships transiting the Panama Canal. Tolls are set to recover all costs of operating and maintaining the canal and are paid, together with other Commission revenues, into the Panama Canal Commission fund established in the U.S. Treasury.

Mr. Chairman, at markup in the Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee, two amendments were adopted. The first, offered by the gentleman from Louisiana (Mr. TAUZIN), struck from the bill the administration's proposal to shift the source of Commission appropriations from the Panama Canal Commission Fund to the general fund of the Treasury.

The full committee rejected the proposed shift in Commission financing for several reasons. First, there was sentiment that the proposed change accomplished nothing substantive. Under current practice, the Commission's cash-flow problem has been solved in a workable manner with the understanding that the $85.5 million will eventually be repaid in accordance with the fiscal 1981 Appropriation Act. Second, the full committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries was concerned that the proposed language on the repayment of deficits appeared to give implied agreement to such deficits and would allow one deficit to be repaid simply by creating another deficit. This the committee felt should not be done. Third, the committee continues to support the fundamental underlying principle of the Panama Canal Act of 1979 that taxpayer money should not be appropriated for the operation of the canal, which the administration's proposal would have done. Lastly, the committee concluded that the existence of the separate Panama Canal Commission Fund would aid the committee's oversight of the Commission's affairs.

A second committee amendment, offered by the gentleman from California (Mr. SHUMWAY) authorizes the President of the United States to undertake efforts to continue the military commissary, exchange, and APO mail privileges currently enjoyed by the American employees of the Panama Canal Commission after their scheduled termination date of September 30, 1984. A compensating allowance would be authorized by this amendment in the event of loss of these privileges.

Prior to the adoption of the Panama Canal treaties, employees of the canal were able to shop at company-run grocery and retail stores, and the Canal Zone Government maintained its own postal system. These facilities were abolished on October 1, 1979, when the Panama Canal treaties took effect. However, the American employees of the newly formed Panama Canal Commission were allowed a 5-year period during which they could use military commissary, exchange, and APO mail privileges available to U.S. military personnel in Panama. U.S. employees feel that our Government should try to have these privileges extended or should in some way compensate them for their anticipated loss.

Should negotiations on an executive level fail, then the Panama Canal Act of 1979 authorizes, but does not require, a cost-of-living allowance be paid to the employees affected to compensate them for the loss of these privileges. The Panama Canal Commission has allotted $4 million for this possible compensation; however, it is unclear at this time how much, if any, cost-of-living adjustment will be issued.

Mr. Chairman, passage of this authorization bill would permit the Panama Canal Commission to continue operating the canal efficiently and smoothly, thus benefiting the foreign commerce and national security of the United States and her neighbors in Latin America.

This legislation is needed. In 1977, 1978, and 1979, I was among those in the House who opposed the Panama Canal treaties; indeed, the majority of my constituents were opposed to it down in western Kentucky. But having been to Panama on several occasions, and having been the chairman of this subcommittee for some years, I am aware that the United States has benefited from the treaties and that, indeed, we have a strong ally in Panama, one that we certainly need in that part of the world. That is for sure.

Mr. Chairman, I urge my colleagues to support H.R. 4900, the Panama Canal Authorization Act for fiscal year 1985.

□ 1420

Mr. CARNEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Chairman, I thank the chairman of the subcommittee very much for summarizing what is in the fiscal year 1985 Panama Canal Commission authorization bill before us today. I also want to commend you for your diligence in seeking timely House action on this legislation. Certainly we will never be able to seize control over this agency if we do not address its operations in an authorization bill.

As you know, at the proper time, I intend to offer an amendment in an attempt to keep appropriations for the Panama Canal more in line with canal revenues and discourage unnecessary spending.

But at this time, I would like to take a few moments to discuss the nature of canal operations since the 1977 Panama Canal treaties entered into force on October 1, 1979, and the issues Congress must address in this authorizing legislation.

These issues include the level and purpose of appropriations, particularly in view of the canal's declining revenues and increasing operating expenses, and the loss of control over money belonging to the U.S. Government needed to fund canal operations. In addition, H.R. 4900 authorizes a cost-of-living allowance for a select group of approximately 1,000 Federal employees to offset the loss of military exchange, commissary, and postal privileges mandated by the treaty.

Canal operations under the 1977 Panama Canal treaties present Congress with a dilemma. The United States is fully financially responsible for operating and maintaining the canal until the year 2000, but the treaty requires declining U.S. participation in that operation and so we are gradually losing control. Moreover, while the Panamanians are assuming increasing control of the canal, they will have no financial responsibility until the year 2000.

This means that strong congressional oversight will be required in order to exercise any control over Panamanians operating the canal with money from the U.S. Treasury over the next 16 years.

On treaty day, the United States relinquished sovereignty over the entire Panama Canal Zone, completely changing the conditions under which the canal operates. The governmental functions of the agency that originally was responsible for the canal and the Canal Zone Government have been abolished.

The railroad, the piers, and other commercial business activities carried out by the predecessor canal company have been discontinued, reducing overall revenues by many millions of dollars per year. On October 1, 1979, extensive real estate holdings were transferred to the Republic of Panama, and property transfers will continue over the life of the treaty.

Along with drastically reducing revenues realized from overall canal operations, the Panama Canal Treaty also increased canal operating costs because of provisions for payments to Panama. These payments have totaled over $300 million in the treaty's first 4 years and they will increase biennially beginning in fiscal year 1985 because tonnage payments will be indexed to keep up with inflation in the United States.

Also during the 20-year transition to full Panamanian control of the canal, increasing numbers of Panamanians will assume positions of responsibility in the Panama Canal Commission. Four of the nine members of the Supervisory Board, the Deputy Administrator, and a continuously increasing number of administrative employees are Panamanian. Beginning in 1990, the Administrator will be a Panamanian national.

According to the Government of Panama, its citizens are responsible only under the laws of Panama in the performance of their official duties. The United States has acquiesced in this position.

So under the treaties, the United States is faced with full financial responsibility for a canal located in another country and run by increasing numbers of foreign nationals not subject to U.S. law.

In order to deal with this dilemma, and provide for the exercise of maximum control over canal operations, Congress passed the Panama Canal Act of 1979, Public Law 96-70, to implement the treaties.

Public Law 96-70 established the Panama Canal Commission as an appropriated fund agency, subject to the same fiscal and administrative controls to government agencies generally. The most conspicuous effect of this arrangement is that all revenues derived from the operation of the canal are paid into the U.S. Treasury. Canal revenues belong to the U.S. Government. They are deposited in the Treasury and they may be expended only upon, and in accordance with, the terms of congressional authorization and appropriation acts.

The Panama Canal Act of 1979 was designed to provide for close congressional oversight over the canal operations. Indeed congressional oversight was the centerpiece of the implementing legislation, and it is growing more important with the passage of time because of the progressive changes in the organization and management of the canal contemplated by the treaty.

The canal revenue picture aggravates the problem. The loss of the Alaska North Slope oil trade to the Trans-Panama Pipeline in 1983 and the world shipping recession drastically cut canal revenues, and reduced traffic by over 16 percent. Fiscal year 1983 canal revenues were $42 million below the prior year.

At our committee hearings on the authorization in February 1984, we were told that the loss of Alaska North Slope traffic and economic recession in the maritime industry have caused a sizable decline in canal traffic and tolls revenue and that canal revenues are on the decline. Even with a tolls increase in fiscal year 1983, revenues that year were $42 million below 1982.

Since then, the Commission's recent appropriations requests suggest their revenue estimates leave much to be desired and, in fact, are based on what the Commission wants to spend rather than what it will take in.

Consider the past 2 years. In fiscal year 1983, the Commission requested an appropriation of $452.6 million; that same year, actual receipts totaled $398.4 million. For fiscal year 1984, the Commission requested an even higher appropriation of $453.8 million; yet they now project revenues to be $411.2 million. As a result, over $25 million has been proposed for rescission this year. Obviously Congress has appropriated the Commission too much money and we ought to cut back now before spending gets even more out of hand.

These figures suggest there is good reason to question not only the rationale for the fiscal year 1985 appropriation request of $443.9 million, but the Commission's revenue projections on which that request is based. The Commission is projecting that fiscal year 1985 revenues will exceed even the $440.1 million in receipts taken in during the Commission's 1982 banner year, which occurred prior to the opening of the Trans-Panama Pipeline and the loss of Alaska North Slope oil traffic. It does not make much sense.

It is up to the Congress to make sure that appropriations to the Panama Canal Commission conform as closely as possible to canal revenues; otherwise, the taxpayer will have to pay the difference. There is absolutely no prohibition in the law against the use of taxpayer dollars to operate the canal. Appropriations are limited to estimated canal revenues but there is no statutory requirement that appropriations be made solely from the Panama Canal Commission Fund and not from the general fund.

In the event that revenues are insufficient to cover all authorized operating expenses of the canal, appropriations would necessarily be made from the general fund for payment of such operating costs. The treaty obligation to maintain and operate the canal would require the United States to make such appropriation. Inasmuch as under the 1977 treaty the United States has the obligation to continue operation of the Panama Canal until the end of the century and the source of funds for that operation is not limited by treaty or by statute to the revenues derived from the operation, any cost of the operation is a general obligation of the United States payable from the general fund if the revenues from the operation are insufficient to cover the costs.

Indeed, the use of taxpayer dollars is clearly contemplated in the Panama Canal Act if canal revenues do not cover costs, or if there are no canal revenues at all.

With operating costs on the increase, no plans to raise tolls, and the canal revenues on the decline, the taxpayers of this country should be interested in how the canal is spending appropriate funds.

For example, in the past 4 years, the Commission has spent some $5.6 million for employee recreation and facilities, to cover the costs of such things as swimming pools and tennis court maintenance. Even though the Commission had a $4 million loss last year, they plan to spend another $2.5 million to continue this recreation program over the next 2 years.

In addition to this multimillion dollar recreation program, H.R. 4900 contains an unlimited authorization for a special contingency fund for "disbursements by the Administrator of the Commission for employee recreation and community projects." These are cash grants, made at the Administrator's discretion, to certain clubs like yacht clubs, country clubs, golf clubs, riding clubs, and saddle clubs, for the purpose of improving employee morale and welfare. Since treaty day, the Administrator has disbursed over $100,000, an excessive amount, to these selected groups, and despite declining revenues, there has been no effort to curtail this practice.

Such disbursements might have been appropriate under conditions that prevailed during earlier years, but it is almost impossible to justify this type of spending in the context of present day restrictions on spending by U.S. Government agencies and certainly when canal revenues are not covering costs, and revenues and traffic are on the decline.

Another "perk" for the Administrator is a free residence, complete with maids, gardeners, servants, and round-the-clock chauffeur service. If the press in this country is upset about isolated incidents involving the private use of Government vehicles, how about the 24-hour chauffeur service which cost about $25,000 per year for a car and driver which is available to the Administrator of the Panama Canal Commission round the clock? And this is in addition to H.R. 4900's unlimited authorization for the "residence of the Administrator" which, in 1983, cost over $100,000 for general maintenance and operation of the residence, including almost $50,000 for his household staff. On top of that is an entertainment account of $25,000 per year!

Despite the U.S. Comptroller General's 1982 decision (B-204078) that the residence expenses of the Administrator are within the scope of 5 U.S.C. 5913, and that the Administrator is therefore required to pay 5 percent of his salary for rent (approximately $3,000), he continues to live rent free.

In addition, the American people ought to know that the Congress is moving even further to feather the Administrator's nest. The Panama Canal Subcommittee just has approved unlimited authority for the Administrator to settle claims. If that bill passes, the Administrator of the Panama Canal Commission, who will be a foreign national in 1990, will have more authority to incur obligations against the U.S. Treasury than even our own U.S. Cabinet officers. The Reagan administration agrees with me that the United States should not be liable for vessel accidents in the Panama Canal, and I would alert my colleagues to my separate statement on this issue in today's RECORD.

Mr. Chairman, Congress is abdicating its responsibility to the American people by not insisting on some serious belt tightening in canal operations.

If the present trends are allowed to continue, in 1990 we are going to have a Panamanian Administrator of the Panana Canal with a "cushier" job than the President of Panama. He will have a direct pipeline into the U.S. Treasury, and all at U.S. expense.

If present Commission spending patterns are allowed to continue, Congress will have to take the blame for supporting, with the U.S. Government's money, a new privileged class in Panama comprised of those lucky enough to work for the canal.

Speaking of privileges, Mr. Chairman, I would like to discuss the special cost-of-living allowance for U.S. citizen employees of the Commission which is authorized in H.R. 4900. It is designed to offset the loss of military postal, exchange, and commissary privileges pursuant to paragraph 2, article 13, of the agreement in implementation of article 3 of the Panama Canal Treaty of 1977. Approximately 1,000 Commission employees will be affected by this loss of privileges and the Commission's budget includes $4 million to compensate for this loss. This breaks down to a pay increase of about $4,000 per employee for the first year. Commission employees have testified that this is not enough to cover increased living costs they will have to bear as a result of this loss of privilege.

In my view, it is more reasonable and cost conscious to extend the privileges than to provide a compensatory COLA for these employees. Such an extension would require the concurrence of the Panamanian Government and, if granted, would tell us Panama needs and wants the remaining U.S. citizen Commission employees to stay on the job and proceed with the transition to full Panamanian control of the canal.

If that is not the case, however, this Nation should seriously consider the possible effects of setting a precedent by authorizing a COLA to compensate a select group of approximately 1,000 employees of one Federal agency for lost "privileges" at a time when Americans all across this land are being asked to pay more and pay directly for services that traditionally have been provided by their Government.

Mr. Chairman, there are approximately 1,650 permanent U.S. citizen employees of the Panama Canal Commission to whom an estimated $72.3 million will be paid as total compensation in 1984. That works out almost $44,000 a year. Of those employees, in fiscal year 1983, 82 percent of the pilot force earned between $65,000 and $100,000 per year. By comparison, the average salary of the remaining 6,900 Panamanian, 3 country nations Commission employees is about $16,400. For further comparison, 1983 Office of Personnel Management statistics indicate that the average salary of the average Federal employee working in the United States is $24,000, and the average salary paid to U.S. employees working abroad is $23,300.

Mr. Chairman, these Americans working for the Commission were not sent to Panama by the U.S. Government to work. They went on their own free will because they wanted to, and not because they were on official orders. The treaty granted them eligibility for military exchange, commissary and postal privileges for the first 5 years under the treaty. They were not necessarily eligible for these benefits before the treaty entered into force, though they could use facilities run by the predecessor company and the Canal Zone Government. However, those facilities and services may no longer be provided under the treaty. Also under the treaty, the number of Americans working at the canal is supposed to decrease. Would we, therefore, violate the spirit of the treaties if we provided an incentive for these Americans to stay? Will canal revenues cover these personnel costs? If they will not, should the American people be asked to support this one group of employees in the manner being proposed? I think not, and hope the privileges will be extended so we can avoid setting a precedent and authorizing the COLA as provided in this bill.

Mr. Chairman, it is the job of the Congress to see that money belonging to the Government from whatever source is spent wisely. We must make sure that the Commission sets an example for the frugal operation of the canal which can be followed when the Panamanians assume full control in the year 2000. If the United States is to operate and maintain the canal effectively, efficiently, and properly between now and the year 2000, unnecessary expenditures of appropriated funds should not be permitted.

Some would argue that there is no sense in trying to reduce spending by the Panama Canal Commission because any savings could result in a profit payment to Panama. But it makes absolutely no sense whatever to
